HOW TO KNOW THE GERMAN ARMY INSIGNIA

With a few exceptions stated below, all armies are dressed in gray (feldgrau), a cap or covered helmet, a tunic, a great coat, trousers or pants, long boots (worn over or under trousers) and shoulder straps with regimental number or monogram edged with various colors or state colors (one year volunteers). The great coats are sometimes of dark blue.

The new German field uniform has a preeminently German appearance and is very popular. The pocket is set diagonally in the skirt of the blouse or tunic and is placed inside, so that even if bulging full the appearance is good. The collar is a falling collar which can be turned up for warmth. The color is of field gray and field green, so as to promote invisibility. The American system of insignia is unknown to the Germans, who secure the differentiation by the color of the buttons, style of caps, color of the facings and the pipings. etc.

The colored pipings and facings do not destroy the invisibility, as might be surmised. On the contrary, the colors retained, adapt themselves to the terrain where the vegetation is never of an entirely uniform color.

Cap-bands are often gray colored. Staff officers wear a carmine band to cap and broad carmine trouser stripe.

Infantry: The uniform of the infantry is as given above, with an edging according to corps. The cap band is red or gray colored.

Jager and Schutzen (Rifles): These troops are dressed in gray green with a green strap edging and wear a shako instead of a helment. The cap-band is red or gray covered.

Cavalry: Stand up collars are worn. Lancers (Uhlans) and Hussars wear special cut tunics and special headdress. The edging of shoulder strap varies in color, but the dragoons have a single and the cuirassiers a double edging. The cap bands are of various colors.

Field Artillery: The field artillery wears a black piping to the collar, red grenade on shoulder strap, brass buttons (white metal in guard corps) and a black cap-band.

Engineers: The engineers wear a black piping to the collar, no grenade; white metal buttons and a cap-band of black.

Train: For the train the edging to the collar and tunic is of blue. In the supply department it is crimson. The cap-band is of blue.

Medical: The medical corps wear a red edging to a blue collar patch and a cap-band of black, Veterinary: The veterinary wears a red edging to a black collar patch.

Guard regiments wear two four-inch tabs of braid on either side of the collar and white buttons. The shank of sidearm tassel shows the number of battalion; on the top and bottom, the number of the company: 1, white; 2, red; 3, yellow; 4, blue; 5, green.

Landwehr: The Landwehr wear a cross on head-dress; caps are now mostly all gray.

The cockade on the soft front of cap is of red, white, and black, while the cockade on the cap-band shows the state. Thus, Prussia is black and white.

NOUS SOMMES ICI.

Two weeks ago it was "Over There!" Now we are "Over Here," in spite of the perils of war and of the deep. Many of the precautions taken may have seemed unnecessary, but no precaution is too small to be overlooked. "It never does to underrate the enemy," is a military axiom.

The spirit and also the manner in which those on our present passenger list have assisted in taking all precautions that could be thought of, and in carrying out the various ship's duties which fell to their lot, will be a pleasant memory.

If they carry out the desires of their leaders, for each one on board has some leader, if they carry on when on the firing line as well as they have done on board here, under their capable commander, the result of the war will be decided all the sooner for their efforts, which will have only one result, "Victory!"

Captain U. S. Navy, Commanding.

MERCI ET AU REVOIR

We are fortunately so constituted that our greatest hardships, in retrospective, frequently assume a humorous aspect. The discomforts and perils of the danger zones are now fit subjects for jokes. Nevertheless, we know that the dangers were real, and that, had this convoy been in less skillful hands, we might not now be the living menaces to Kaiserism that we know we are.

To the Captain and Crew of this good ship we are indebted for both our personal safety and a pleasant voyage, rendered doubly so by "The Hatchet". We are glad to have had the opportunity to become better acquainted with our brothers of the Navy, and hope they like us half as well as we like them.

A year ago Uncle Sam's twin war dogs, the Army, and the Navy, were small underfed pups, but they have grown mightily in size and strength, are still growing, and are destined to save humanity by throtling the devasting Teutonic boar.

To our brothers of the Navy, we, the Army, can now only say, God bless you and au revoir.

L'ENVOI

The port's ahead--the harbor, and 'secure';
Soon we will rest where quiet waters lave
The sacred shore of France.

We did endure one danger all together—
Now we part—
One sails away
Into the western blur that leads back home.
The other sets his heart on 'No-man's-land'
And, fire in his glance, moves to the east
In France—poor bleeding France.

And so, adieu, and au revoir—
We've met, we've parted
And may meet again.
But while we're far apart, good pals,
Remember always you're American.

THE LAST FAREWELL

"Shorty" was eating a sandwich when interviewed but he wants us to say to the readers of "The Hatchet" that he and all the other brave men who have been doing such valint service in the paper's composing and press room, have had a corking good time doing it.

After taking another bite out of his sandwich and being invited to continue, he took the other bite, then began with, "It's been a d—— fine paper:" and ended.

GOD-SPEED!

It has often been remarked that a happy incident of the war is the bringing together of the Army and Navy in comradeship based on mutual respect and confidence. The truth of this has been again brought home by the experience of the present cruise.

Now the time draws near for us to wish "God speed" to these Army shipmates. That they carry along with them our best wishes, goes without saying; but these best wishes are also accompanied by something more difficult to express, something more personal.

The duties of "all hands" do not permit much opportunity for social intercourse. But the saying, "Make an ocean voyage with a man to know him", holds true. We feel pretty well acquainted with the men in kahki and hope that they will carry away as pleasant remembrances as they leave behind.

As for the singing regiment, the good old——, we shall watch you with special interest. We've enjoyed your music and your jokes, and we thank you for them. Your soldier-like qualities, also, have not gone unnoted. It's not the color of the skin that counts but the hearts underneath. These we know are brave and loyal.

Executive Officer.

GERMANY, June 26: Von Kuehlmann in today's speech before the Chancellor and all the State Secretaries said that Burian was a welcome successor to Czernin as Austria's Foreign Minister and also announceds Radoslaw's resignation in Bulgaria.

THE KANSAS CITY STAR

July 15th, 1918.

My dear Mrs. Goode:

Mrs. Roosevelt has given me your letter. Pray treat this answer as confidential, as I believe that nothing but harm would come from public agitation in the matter. Of course, quarters for colored nurses should be supplied with our troops in France; but under existing conditions I think it would be well to have the quarters of the white and the colored nurses separate because of the same reasons that make us have the white and colored troops in separate regiments. Why do you not yourself take this letter to the lady you mention in connection with the Red Cross, or to Mr. Davison himself?

Very truly yours,

(Signed) Theodore Roosevelt

Mrs. Eslanda C. Goode,
2460 - 7th Avenue,
New York City.

P.S. Have you tried seeing one of the responsible heads of the Red Cross in person? I wish you would take this letter and go to such a head and talk with him or her. I believe you will be more apt to get results than if I for instance or any other third party wrote.

UNITED--WAR--WORK--CAMPAIGN

After spending the night and one-half day at Piney Woods I left for Jackson on the noon train, Tuesday November 5th. Upon reaching Jackson I went directly to our office which is located in the Lobby of the Edward's House, just to the left of the front entrance, I found my good friend and State Director Mr. J. C. Wilson on the job in the midst of a stack of correspondence relative to speakers for the Drive. I immediately plunged into the work with him, and for the balance of the after noon we were busy with Telephone and Telegram wires and letters appointing and routing our list of speakers to various points.

My own route was then mapped out to include places where the need was greatest for an effective campaign. During the after-noon Miss Lillian Davis representing the State Y.W.C.A came in and appealed for some one to be recommended among the Colored women of the State to go out and help stimulate interest in the Women for this First United War Work Drive. The matter was left to me, and after giving sue consideration and studying over the various people, who might be appointed; It came to my mind that Miss Eva L. Spell, graduate of Piney Wood School, class of 1918, who had travelled in the North through the summer in a very successful way for Piney Wood School and would be able to do this work. My recommendation was confirmed and telegram sent notifying her of the appointment. She came to Jackson on the night train, where I met her and gave her instructions where the office was and call there the following morning for eight o'clock appointment. It was then necessary for me to leave with in the next half hour on the midnight train (I.C) to reach my first appointment, which was at Sardis.

I reached Sardis fove o'clock in the morning and was met by Prof. Blanks, Principal of the City High School, we were soon at his comfortable and well kepted little home which is in the midst of a flower and vegetable garden. After dinner we went down to the court House where both white and Colored were assembling, the court House was soon packed with some three hundred white and Colored men from the various Townships and Beats, representatives of the Panola County who had come to receive information and instruction relative to the war work drive. After some good musical numbers selections lead by Prof. ~~Blanks~~ Ross, the County Demonstration Agent, Mr. R. M Carrier acted as Master of Ceremony for the County Superintendant, R.M Young who is County Director opened up the meeting. The first speaker was President, ~~Blanks~~ of a very well known University in Southern Tennessee called- he was then called upon to deliver an address. After which Senator Leroy Percy, the State Director, told of his experience in France and paid a very High compliment to the part the Negro had played in the War, from the time he had reached there, builded roads and buildings for Houses, the declarations of Negro soldiers for bravery by France with highest meddle of honor.
I was scheduled to leave immediately after the meeting, but Mr. Carrier, said that I could reach the next point the following day and still remain in Sardis over night and just as they promised,they packed the Court House with White and Colored to hear me make an address on the War. Mr.Carrier came to me just before meeting and told me that Senator Percy had asked him to tell me his regret,for not being able to remain in Sardis over night to hear the night address,as he had to go clean across the Country to fill an appointment. The next day after the meeting many white citizens came up and said, " while it was the third time they had heard me speak that they could have for me in Sardis again".

I left Sardis that night at mid-night for Grenanda,where I Snatched a few hours sleep and left the following morning for Water Velley,on the train I met Miss Spell who had been directed to Water Valley we reached there and was met by Rev. Topp the Baptist Pastor,who assigned Miss Spell to a home and took me to his house. After meeting some of the leading white people, we went home to dinner and returned to town for afternoon mail and found that the town had gone wild over the false alarm of peace all factories,railroad shops and business had closed down and people thronging the streets,shooting sky rockets, pistols,the bells rung for an hour. During the afternoon

During the afternoon Miss Spell met the ladies in after noon meeting. And at night the beautiful Baptist Church was packed with Colored citizens of Water Valley and some of the leading white people,it was my second address at Water Valley with in a year and both the White people and colored declared that they appreciated what I had said even more than my previous address and invited me to come at any time. The next morning the Post master told us that one of the men he had with him was well read and one of the best informed white man in Town and that he had said "that he never heard any address that was any more logical and appealing to him, more than what Jones had said the night before"

The next day we went to Coffeeville accompanied by Rev. Topp and Rev. -Story . After dinner we went down town to the Court House and found that there were more white people than colored, there were about two hundred white people and fifty or sixty colored in the meeting. Adresses were delivered by the following: Judge from Tupelo, Rev. Davidson minister from Greenville, Miss. who had spent many visits in France and paid the Negro very High Compliment and a Mrs Egbert Jones of Holly Springs, one of the most prominent white families of North Mississippi read interesting paper as to the work of the Y.W.C.A. I was then called upon to close the meeting with my address, it was the first time that I had spoken to race of white people representing the masses as well as the classes, I had been accustomed to speaking to large numbers of colored people and representatives of the White people. I was a little fearful as to how they would take my address, but when it was over more than a score came up and told me that it was well received and that they had come to realize that Democracy must operate for all people regardless as to color. We left Miss Spell here to hold meeting at one of the colored churches, for the women and girls and I went on down to Winona where I found the colored people having a big meeting against the women signing the labor cards. In the meeting they expressed them selves as feeling thatthis was a put up job and it gave the white people an opportunity to control the labor and their women and that would compel the house wife to work for some one regardless as to what we hadto do at home,and it would control the labor in that they could agree to pay so much to cook or wash and if they did not work for one at that price she would be compelled to work for another family. A white man representing the Local Board was present, and explained that all the women white and black had to sign the card and that it ~~don't~~ did not mean what they thought it did. I was then called upon to make a closing talk,I corroborated what the white gentleman had said,but explained that while it was not the intent of the Law to control labor and prices, nevertheless if the White people of Winona were given to ~~misused~~ misconstrue the Law,they could do just what the colored people were afraid they would do; and then I gave him this message to take to the White people of Winona"it is good that this meeting of the colored people has happened,it is good that you are here, and tonight the lesson you gained from this meeting,for your people,is that the colored people and white people of the better class are to see that the colored people have lost confidence in the white people of Winona,for if they had the right confidence in the white people they would never have doubted the proposed use of the labor registers and would not have been afraid that you people of Winona would prostitute a law; this ~~matter would have~~ fact be been well worth while and this be one of the greatest meetings ever held in your town." The white gentleman acknowledged the truth and what I had said,and expressed his appreciation for having had the opportunity to h have heard me and to have had me in their town.

The next afternoon we went to the Southern Depot where I met Miss Spell, and left for West Point. At West Point a delegation of prominent colored citizens were at the station as a reception committee to meet me, this delegation consisted of four or five men- However it was necessary for me to go on to Columbus to arrange for the next meeting. Miss Spell got of a West Point and went out to Methodist preachers home. I reached Columbus about 7 o'clock and went directly to the County Director's office, where I had a conference relative to Campaign. I then went to the Colored Hotel and retired, the next morning I took a train at 6'oclocl for West Point. The meeting was held in as what is known as Baptist town in the Baptist church, at this meeting Dr. & Mrs Johnson and faculty and entire student body of the Mary Holmes Seminary helped to fill the spacious church. After my address I was invited by Dr. Johnson to come out to the Seminary and make anoth address to the students body, I had to leave immediately to get my next train for Columbus, where I was met by Prof. T. P Harris and taken to the home of Mrs. Ferguson. That night I had an opportunity to talk to a very large and cultured class ofour people in the beautiful methodist church. The next morning I inspected the Public School, addressed the graduating class, the Public School System here is developing one of the best Industrial department of any Public School in the State of Mississippi. I left the next day for Winona and down to Jackson, which was all night ride, I reached Jackson in time to get a train for the school, reached Piney Woods about six, spent the morning in the office and went back to Jackson on the noon train, upon reaching the War Work office I was informed by Mr. Wilson that Chickasaw County had been phoning and telegraphing that I was wnated over there, it was necessary to leave at six and to go to Meridian where I laid over three of four hours and took a train for Okolona the County Seat . After being up the entire second night;, I was met at the train by Mr. C.W. Gilliam the proprietor of one of the largest Negro General stores of the State, who had been delegated by Prof. Battles who was away on business to take care of me, it was stinging cold and about five o'clock in the morning we soon reached his beautiful spacious residence and a glodwing fire, where I turned in and slept until the next noon. The County first took me to Houston where I addressed a large ordience of white and colored people in the Court House and started the Campaign of with nearly three hundred of subscription pledges in fifteen minutes. After my address I returned to Okolona, where I was met at the Station Prof. Battles and other prominent negroes and two of the prominent white men of the town. We immediately went over to the railroad shops and where all work had been suspended in the Shop and yards for twenty five minutes to hear my address. I spoke from a large pile of cross tires having been introduced by Prof. Battles. After the address several hundred in five and ten dollar subscriptions were taken. After dinner Stores in the town of Okolona closed, the student boys of the Okolona Industrial school marched to the Ball Park the Cadet corps of the school drilled for one half hour, and then I was in troduced by Prof Wallace & Battle and held the close attention of the large ordience that filled the Grand Stand for one and one-half hours, after which subscriptions were taken . That nihgt we went to Egypt Miss. through the Country about twenty miles the meeting was held in a great large Commissary that was filled and packed and jammed with colored people. I stood on a box in the center of the store and talked and told stories and jollied the crowd along for nearly two hours , at the end of which time we had $505 for the United War Work Drive , most of which was cash we had lots of fun in the meetings from the fact that so many men in the colored subscription; subscribed $10 by the name of Gun, when one young fellows came up, I asked him, "was he a Son of a Gun who had just subscribed" he said, "No". I said are you a Son of a Gun, any way that had subscribed here and he said, he was; and gave the name of the Gun. From then on the meeting was swamped with every Son of a Gun in the place who wanted to be known, that he was a Son of a Gun and was subscribing. We had been driven out here in a large seven passenger Car of Mr. Vice and another white Gentleman, who is a Banker of Okolona. After the meeting we were soon back to Town, dreaming of what had happened down in Egypt.

The Next Night we motored out to Buena Vista, where we had a very successful meeting, The following morning I addressed the Students of the Okolona Industrial School one of the best Negro Institutions in the State. Then I was out for Macon, Miss where a meeting of five thousand Negros had been planned, the rain cut the number off considerable but the Court House was packed and jammed with both white and colored, I had to leave immediately after my address and had the opportunity to exchange a few words with Miss Spell as I passed out of the Court House and caught a train for Meridian. I found that the last train going for Jackson had left and it would be necessary to stay until morning, which would cause me to remain in Jackson the next day until four o'clock I therefore, took the first train out for Hattiesburg, changed to the Gulf and Ship Island and reached home on the noon train Sunday November 17th. very much tired and worn but, happy in the thought that I was having a great opportunity to help put over the first great UNITED WAR WORK DRIVE OF OUR COUNTRY.

COLORED OFFICERS AND THE REGULAR ARMY.

Chief of Staff Revokes Finding of Army Board Which Declared Negroes Disqualified for Officers and Leaders of Men--Record in All Wars Show Race is Not Deficient in Moral Fiber.

Special to THE_____

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 7.--Letters have been forwarded to the War Department by Bishop Charles Spencer Smith as chairman of the Commission on After-War Problems, of the A. M. E. Church, W. T. Andrews, editor of The Daily Herald, Baltimore, Md. and others of like prominence in public affairs, calling attention to an endorsement which had been placed on the application filed by a colored officer who had been overseas, relative to his fitness for admission into the Regular Army. The endorsement, or recommendation, signed by a Board of officers, appointed to investigate the qualifications of candiates for assignments in the reorganized United States Army, after summing up all citations and observations, was as follows:

> "The Board recommends that he be not examined.
> Reason: unqualified by reason of the qualities inherent in the Negro race: an opinion of the Board, based on the testimony of five white officers serving with the 368th Infantry.
> Negroes are deficient in moral fiber, rendering them unfit as officers and leaders of men."

WAR RECORD OF NEGROES REFUTES ABSURD FINDING OF ARMY BOARD

The writers of the communications to the War Department, in addition to condemning the injustice to the officer involved made it quite plain that the colored people of the country resent most strenuously the reflection upon the race as a whole in the bald delaration that "Negroes are deficient in moral fiber, etc.," and regard it as an unsustained indictment of the entire race as a group of incompetents and failures. They declred the charge to be absolutely descredited by the written record of the brilliant achievements of colored officers under fire in the fiercest offensives of the war, and by the published testimony of General Pershing, of Colonel Hayward, and of a score of French officers of highest military standing, all of whom had the advantage of knowing exactly how the colored commanders bore themselves at crucial periods on the field of battle.

3/6/105

The objectionable memorandum is refuted, the writers assert, by the unbroken chain of valorous dees and heroism of Negroes in all the wars of the Republic from Bunker Hill to Carrizal and in France from Verdun to the siege of Metz.

NO EXCLUSION OF ANY OFFICER ON ACCOUNT OF COLOR.

Dr. Emmitt J. Scott, Special Assistant to the Secretary of War, taking up the matter directly with the War Department, made this reply, upon the authority of the officials having charge of the question at issue, in a letter addressed to Editor Andrews, of the Baltimore Herald:

> "With reference to the marked copy of The Daily Herald, containing an editorial, quoting an endorsement placed upon the discharge of a colored lieutenant who applied for retention in the service, I beg to say that this whole matter has been before the War Department, and I am pleased to inform you that the Chief of Staff has personally directed the Commanding General at Camp Meade to revoke the finding: he has also directed that in the matter of colored officers being commissioned in the Army, there is to be no exclusion on account of color.
> "I am sure you will be pleased that this action has been taken by the War Department, and I personally share with you and the entire race the satisfaction of feeling that the finding quoted by you, and which was placed upon the record of the colored officer, will not appear on his permanent record as filed in the War Department."

120

The answer of Dr. Scott to the editor of the Baltimore Herald will serve as a reply to the many inquirers who have shown an anxiety to know the status of colored officers who desire to be retained for service in the Regular Army.

Washington, D.C._____Recently in the U. S. House of Representatives, Honorable Martin B. Madden of Illinois spoke with particular reference to certain statements which have been made derogatory to the services of colored troops abroad. Mr. Madden, through a sense of fair-play, insisted that certain correspondence he had received from Dr. Emmett J. Scott, Secretary-Treasurer, Howard University, together with other letters and newspaper reports which clearly and definitely controverted the charges made against colored troops should be entered in the Congressional Record as an offset to the proproganda which has been under way for some months to discredit not only the record of colored American troops abroad but the record of French colonial troops in the occupied area as well.

Dr. Scott assembled a formidable array of documents to controvert this German proproganda in America including a letter written by Ambassador Jusserand of the French Republic to Mr. Henry E. Baker, of the Howard Park Citizens' Association, Washington, D.C., in which M. Jusserand states that the allegations constantly and persistently spread by German proproganda against our colored troops are absolutely unfounded; that their behavior does not justify in the least the scurrilous accusations freely launched against them in sheets sent here from Germany, ready printed and in enormous quantities, for distribution all over the country. The correspondence also contained clippings from the New York Times, the Washington Post, Associated Press dispatches, and correspondence between Senator Selden P. Spencer of Missouri, and former Secretary of State Colby.

"Under all the circumstances", Dr. Scott said in his letter to Congressman Madden, "it must be clearly evident that a grave injustice has been done these French colonial troops, who fought so bravely against the Teutonic enemies during the world conflict. Their services were then regarded at face value. They helped to save the precious jewel of liberty for all the world. They proved to be troops not afraid of Germany's best and most seasoned veterans. It seems particularly malignant under the circumstances not to have in the Congressional Record the above statements, which correct the very unfair- to use no more vigorous language- proproganda which has been circulated against them in this country. I refer to the matter as a colored American, because proproganda reflections of the same character were quite generally circulated about colored American troops who served in France. The libels in that case were finally and effectively disposed of, as they have been in the case mentioned above."

Congressman Madden has again won the wholesouled approval colored Americans for his courageous action in co judice against our Colored troops. His remarks printed in pamphlet form and are being very buted.

To understand this International Fellowship one must go back to 1914. The outbreak of the World War forced men everywhere to face the deep contradiction between war and the way of Christ. Among the many who, in much travail of spirit, sought a solution, some in every land came to realise not only that a better way could be found but that it must be followed without delay and at whatever cost. It was thus that in Great Britain the Fellowship of Reconciliation came into being at the end of 1914. Men and women from different classes of the community, from different churches and from no church, met and found themselves united in the conviction that war was wrong and for them impossible. They refused to take any part in it, but saw that their only justification for such refusal was to set out to discover together how the way of love and service, as shown in Jesus, could be followed in every relationship of life, and human society be thereby radically transformed. They realise that this conviction as to war was only one aspect of a new outlook on all life born of a deep respect for the personalities of other men and women and for the characteristics of other peoples. To learn to look on all men in this way, to restore the essential brotherhood, broken in our present world-order in a thousand ways, seemed to them the task the World War had revealed. Little groups of seekers became known to one another, and, in the closing days of the year, one hundred and thirty persons came together at Cambridge and founded the Fellowship of Reconciliation. Among them were men and women well known in England and America to-day—Henry Hodgkin, Maude Royden, Richard Roberts, Luch Gardner, W. E. Orchard, George Lansbury, Leyton Richards, Fearon Halliday, etc. While holding that their bond of union was not a common creed but one spirit, the founders of the Fellowship recorded their general agreement in the following terms:

807 Camp Dix N.J.

Our boys overseas are gradually being returned. This week we welcomed back members of the 307th Pioneer Infantry. This regiment was formed in Camp Dix late in July and was sent overseas in September. They arrived in time to take part in that great Meuse Argonne Offensive. The band of this regiment has received unusual honors and had the distinction of being the first Army Post Band, under Lieutenant General Liggett. Some of the boys from this organization hold the coveted Croix de Guerre. Bravery, cheerfulness in the performance of duty have been the marked characteristics of this regiment. The boys have suffered much, slept in rain and mud and a number of times been short of rations.

We take it as a compliment to our race, in respect to their physical fitness and fine physique of our men, to know that from living under such conditions and without any training they could qualify for the A.E.F. athletic meets and win honors. Sergeant Harvey Butler of Montclair, N.J. who is well known in the athletic circle, as an all round athlete, and Corporal Philander Clark of East Orange, hold the honor of being the fastest runners in the Advance Section of the A.E.F. and first Sergeant Edgar Thompson of N.J. as the champion discus thrower.

Early in the spring Butler, Thompson and Clark went to the city of Dijon to take part in the big athletic meet which the A.E.F. was holding. At this meet soldiers had journeyed from all over the A.E.F., white, Jew and Gentile, met on that field. In the midst of thousands of spectators Clark won the hundred yards dash in ten and two fifths seconds; Butler pushing a close second. In the high jump, after an exciting contest, Butler won first place, clearing the bar at five feet four inches. In the discus contest Thompson, [illegible], competed with Lieutenant Byrd, scholastic record holder, and Chaplin Thompson, all round record holder of America. Thompson threw the discus one hundred twenty-seven feet six inches, giving him first place. The French were not modest in their praises for these champions.

At Laungres they carried away unusual honors. Butler, Clark and Thompson were sent to Le Mans, one of the largest embarkation camps in France, to qualify for the Paris meet, they were called to Paris, but the regiment being under sailing orders, the boys were deprived of winning further honors for themselves.

We welcome all our boys from overseas and are glad they represented us in every enterprise of the A.E.F.

Boys we salute you.

AMERICAN RED CROSS PRESENTS TWELVE-STAR SERVICE PIN TO COLORED MINISTER.

34-4-224

Having the right to, and needing a twelve-star service pin, the Rev. R. H. Windsor of Rayville, La., a zealous Red Cross worker, has been presented with a unique decoration by the American Red Cross. The father of nineteen sons, twelve of whom are with the colors, this genial colored minister of the Baptist church probably holds the record for sons in the military service of the United States. If there are any others with similar or better status, they are yet to be heard from.

In the accompanying illustration of the twelve-star pin, topped with the Red Cross insignia, it will be noted that the first bar bears five stars. These represent five individual sons - Bennie, Robbin, Jeff, Johnnie and Archie; the next bar bears two stars representing twins, George and Lafayette; the next bar is similarly decorated, representing William and James, also twins; and the bottom bar, with its three stars, represents the triplets, Matthew, Mark and Luke. Eight of the boys are volunteers, and the other four were called in the draft.

Upon hearing of the remarkable record of the Windsor family, President Wilson, who is also President of the American Red Cross, wrote to the Reverned Mr. Windsor, as follows:

"I am writing to say with what interest and admiration I have learned of the fact that twelve of your sons are in the service of our country and the thirteenth impatiently waiting to follow them in. This is a splended record and I congratulate you from the bottom of my heart. The colored troops have proved themselves finr soldiers."

DEMOCRACY AND THE COLORED SOLDIER

War Camp Community Service for the Colored Soldier, Sailor and Marine.

War Camp Community Service, a spirit rather than an institution, has inspired an attitude of fairness in the treatment of the colored people; it has instituted acts of helpfulness toward them. Through this may come the interest and practical assistance of white people that will improve their streets, their schools, their playgrounds and living conditions, - that will make them feel they are sharing in the democracy they have helped to preserve.

It was not until after the fall of 1917 that the need of recreational provision for colored troops was encountered, since only then did colored soldiers begin to arrive in any great numbers in the army camps. Initial work was begun in Montgomery, Alabama. By September, 1917, the colored churches here were harboring soldiers, colored business men were entertaining some of the men in their homes, football games had been arranged and steps were being directed toward the opening of a soldiers' club. In November, 1917, War Camp Community Service had arranged activities in thirteen communities and was organizing work in ten more. So the work grew steadily, and now, in January, 1918, War Camp Community Service is actively directing work in fifty-one communities, has established thirty-nine soldiers' clubs in these communities, and employs twenty-seven colored assistants, including girls' workers, to carry on its program of recreation and hospitality for the colored soldier.

Provision made for the colored soldiers are identical with those made for the white soldier. War Camp Community Service establishes club houses, dormitories, canteens, community centers for the colored soldiers. Entertainment is provided through dances, community sings, home hospitality, church socials, automobile rides, moving pictures, Sunday musicals. There are information bureaus, Travelers' Aid Service, "Square Deal" Association, relief work, (especially during the epidemic of Spanish Influenza). Patriotic Leagues are formed among the girls, girls' recreational camps are established; mending is done for the soldiers. Convalescent soldiers are given automobile rides and at the hospital class the opportunity to read the magazines and to enjoy the eatables provided through the efforts of War Camp Community Service.

But there were many difficulties that stood in the way before this comprehensive program of recreation could be perfected. The colored soldier's conception of what was his due was, in some cases, apt to be an idea that these rights were long overdue, and he was impatient to hurry along that democracy where the colored man would come into his own. Dealt with on a broad and sympathetic basis, this problem of the colored soldiers dissatisfaction has been solved to great degree through just the various activities of War Camp Community Service mentioned above. A lack of funds at first, offered another obstruction to the immediate provision of adequate recreational facilities. A further lack - that of understanding among both colored and white civilians of the aim of these beneficent activities - hindered the progress of the work in many communities. Occassionally mistrust, sometimes indifferance, and often inexperience impeded progress.

How the situation was met in Des Moines, Iowa, is interesting. Here members of the negro officers' training camp were of the highest type of colored men in the country, most of the men of collegiate training. There were not many colored families of their own type to provide pleasant association; the negro committee, undirected, was unable to remedy an increasingly embarassing situation; and although granted equal rights with the white men through the laws of Iowa, the negro soldier could not comfortably put this theory into practise. Community singing and a colored military review at the Drake Stadium through the offices of the War Camp Community Service where the troops were shown in a complimentary light, helped to solve the difficulty somewhat, for such a dignified public appearance and the splendid singing characteristic of the race, stimulated sympathy and approval in the minds of the citizen spectators.

Past difficulties, however, possess small importance in view of present and effective accomplishment. War Camp Community Service soldiers' and sailors' clubs are perhaps the most interesting and certainly the most far-reaching of the numerous social activities. One is reminded of that copybook maxim of one's youth, "Great oaks from little acorns grow" in speaking of the War Camp Community Clubs. From small beginnings when small clubs provided pool room, temperance bar and dining room as concessions to help maintain the place in addition to the club room proper with game tables, books and easy chairs, as in Chillicothe, Ohio and clubs as in Battle Creek, Michigan, which maintained a restaurant in addition to the usual club room features, until the present day when entire buildings are converted into clubs, or in some cases, buildings are constructed specially. War Camp Community Service clubs have grown until they have reached the perfection of appointments of a modern, splendidly equipped club house. For example: The Liberty Club opened in December 1918, in Norfolk, Virginia, contains reading, writing and recreation rooms, a dormitory with showers, a canteen and a collection of books selected by the American Library Association and a theatrical stage. During one week one thousand and sixty-eight colored men in uniform availed themselves of the privileges of the club. The facilities of the club in Augusta, Georgia, include reading and writing rooms, a dormitory, pool and billiard rooms, piano and victrola, cafeteria, visitors' parlor, lavatories with shower baths, and rest room for women. Sometimes dormitories fill a more urgent need than a club. In New York City two four-story buildings were fitted-up as a dormitory to accommodate about two hundred men. In Mount Holly, New Jersey, near Camp Dix, the club in addition to an excellent equipment, includes extensive grounds. "The grounds of the negro soldiers' club house" says the reports"are even better than those belonging to the white soldiers' club. There is a broad front lawn with noble shade, a vegetable patch in the rear, fruit trees, and a grape arbor bearing luscious grapes, a chicken run, flowers and spreading trees in plenty. Women of prosperous colored families are doing fine service as volunteers in connection with the clubhouses."

But even the most extensive facilities cannot avail much unless there is a proper management - unless there is behind the management a moving spirit of hospitality, kindliness, and helpfulness. One can observe in dance, community sings, free moving picture tickets, home dinners and all activities for men in uniform that this spirit characterizes the whole War Camp Community Service movement in colored work. At the first party held for colored troops at the club in Mt. Holly, New Jersey, where more than three hundred colored soldiers were present, the dancing was so much enjoyed that every Wednesday and Saturday night were set aside for dances in order to make certain this type of enjoyment for the men would continue. After a week-end dance at the club in Alexandria,

Virginia, where the chaperone and young women lent all their energy and spirit to making the boys feel at home, the soldiers remained over night. The following day after attending church, the men were invited to various homes for dinner. In the evening the club was again a source of recreation for them, for here they sang, read and wrote letters.

The colored soldier was made happy on Thanksgiving Day and on Christmas. Almost every War Camp Community Service club provided dinner and entertainment of some sort on these days. Returning soldiers at the Debarkation Hospital at Phoebus, Virginia, were especially invited to Thanksgiving dinner prepared by the women of Hampton, Virginia. At the newly opened clubhouse in Columbia, South Carolina a unique form of an entertainment was the breakfast dance on Thanksgiving morning attended by seventy-five men. This was followed by the inevitable turkey dinner. The club in Hattiesburg, Mississippi, kept the men entertained with a special program on Thanksgiving evening until the train left for Camp at half-past two in the morning. Christmas festivities in Baltimore began as early as December 23rd with a community sing around the Christmas tree in the city square led by the War Camp Community Service song leader. The following night men were entertained with games and given free tobacco. The festivities culminated in free Christmas dinners served to three hundred men in uniform at the club. In addition to many other Christmas festivities in New York City, the colored soldiers enjoyed under War Camp Community Service auspices with the splendid cooperation of other associations, a moving picture celebration, a basket ball game, a Khaki and Blue dance at the Young Woman's Christian Association. Recreation Center, automobile rides and dinners and general open house for the colored men in uniform. Statistics show that fifteen hundred free dinners, one hundred entertainments, fifteen hundred Christmas gifts were given to the colored men during the month of December in New York City.

All these instances serve to typify the activities in the thirty-nine clubs that War Camp Community Service maintains. As isolated instances they mean little beyond a patriotic service, but taken as a whole they are significant as an indication of the trend toward a democratic conception of "live and let live."

Community Singing under the colored song leaders becomes an outlet of expression for that racial love of music among the colored people that is world-famous. War Camp Community Service holds community sings for the colored soldiers and civilians as it does for the white people. The Sunday community sing in Richmond, Virginia, is exceedingly popular among the colored folk and attracted such numbers in December that at one time it was impossible for the police to cope with the crowd. The colored soldiers' bands come in from neighboring camps, when leave is secured, to furnish music for dances and give concerts at the clubs, and often minstrel shows. Five hundred colored soldiers from the famous "Singing 810th Pioneer Infantry" proved their right to the title by their musical program on Thanksgiving Day. In addition to popular and patriotic songs, the colored folk render in their inimitable and expressive fashion their own religious songs. On the occasion in Galveston, Texas, when a community sing among the colored people was given under the guidance of a member of W.C.C.S. at the city Auditorium, the two thousand seats set aside for the white people were all taken half an hour before the singing began. Here again is a beginning of the democratic attitude.

Emancipation Day in several cities was not allowed to pass without observation under W.C.C.S. guidance. The celebration in Richmond was very impressive, and was marked by the attendance of the heroes of past and present wars-the last of the old veterans of Custer's Post G.A.R., the colored Spanish-American veterans and the khaki clad soldiers of today. Raleigh, N. C. Augusta, Ga., Mobile, Ala., celebrated Emancipation Day with community singing and parades.

Public interest is now turning to welcoming home the soldiers from Atlanta, Ga., Newport News, Va., Alexandria, Virginia, Richmond, Va., have already made the returned soldier feel that his country appreciates his services. "Overseas Week" in Richmond offers instances of the type of entertainments. A house party at the club Monday; a sightseeing trip on Tuesday around the city in automobiles lent by citizens; on Wednesday, colored moving picture theatres opened to the men free; a party on Thursday by the women of the community; a dance Saturday at the club when one hundred men from Camp Lee came over to greet their veteran comrades; a community sing on Sunday and dinner parties in the homes of the Richmond colored people -- this constitutes a real welcome to the colored soldier.

In conjunction with community sing, addresses made by prominent speakers do much to bring the two races together. A colored man of unusual ability, sent by War Camp Community Service talked to the soldiers and civilians in churches, the club and shipyards in Newport News. Speakers from Hampton Institute and Tuskegee Institute have given generous support in making addresses at meetings and in clubs and churches.

The colored traveler, whether soldier or soldier's relative, when in need of assistance looks to the travelers' Aid workers who cooperate with War Camp Community Service or, in some cases, work directly for War Camp Community Service. The colored worker at the station directs travelers, investigates the circumstance attending the traveler alone of boys or girls under fifteen years of age and renders assistance where needed, and lists rooms and accommodations that the town has to offer to soldiers and their relatives. Their work was especially effective in some cities during the epidemic of influenza when many colored people visited their relatives who were ill in camp. Naturally information booths are at the service of white and colored soldier alike, and the splendid work they are doing is well known.

Helping and entertaining the soldier leads to work among the colored girls. Activities were at first carried on through the Young Women's Christian Association but gradually War Camp Community Service began to organize the work along its own lines and to employ colored women assistants. The Patriotic Leagues, so successful among the girls of the white race, were formed among the colored girls. These groups not only entertained the men in uniform through dances and acted as hostesses at the club house parties, but raised funds to assist the men in numerous ways. There is always a program of entertainment for the girls themselves.

Playground work is being developed, groups meet for games; in Baltimore the girls have a weekly military drill and study First Aid and Home Care for the sick. It was here, too, that the girls conceived the idea of collecting fruit for the soldiers by means of a Fruit Shower Dance, and these girls keep a store room of books and articles which they give to the soldiers and the needy of the community. Very interesting is the school held for a few days at Hampton, Virginia, for colored women workers where training fits them to go out as community organizers and assistants under War Camp Community Service in various colored communities of the country. The Patriotic League in Louisville has to its credit the camp that was established at Harrod's Creek. During the summer months many eager applicants could not be accommodated even for a few days at the camp, for the outdoor life of recreation, quiet hours, patriotic services and study, singing and moonlight rides made this a most popular place for colored girls in Louisville during the season.

Just how far War Camp Community Service has achieved results will be shown by a glance at some of the work for December 1918. In Baltimore, the month proved to be the busiest and most successful in the history of the club, with a greater attendance than during any other month - 1645 men availed themselves of the privileges of the dormitory and canteen, in addition to the hundred who came daily. The women's and girls' clubs were active in attentions to the soldiers. A colored club in Washington, District of Columbia, was opened, making the third of its kind in that city. Returning soldiers in Alexandria, Virginia, have volunteered assistance in War Camp Community Service activities and have organized a group of colored lads as Boy Scouts to assist in War Camp Community Service work. The citizens of Hampton, Virginia gave evidence of the growth of War Camp Community Service spirit in their increased hospitality during the month toward the colored soldier. The interesting feature of work in Newport News is the progress of plans for a large recreation center for returning soldiers. The deep appreciation of visitors at the Liberty Club in Norfolk, Virginia, speaks well for the entertainment offered for the provisions for cleanliness, convenience and cheer. In Columbia, South Carolina, great preparations are on foot to welcome home the overseas troops. The Red Circle Club was a popular resort of two thousand ninety soldiers during one week. The reading and writing rooms were in continuous use, and the game tables and lunch counters always crowded. The War Camp Community Service program in Atlanta, Georgia, is being modified to meet the requirements of changing conditions, for the presence of convalescents with the probable increase in their number and the decrease in the number of the drafted men, necessitates increased service at the hospital in cooperation with the Red Cross. A special program of entertainment and recreation will be followed for these wounded men. Little Rock, Kansas, presents an example of excellent cooperation of the colored people with the War Camp Community Service. Although there are only a thousand soldiers there now, whereas formerly there were eight thousand, War Camp Community Service encouragement and tireless work has stimulated a greater degree of interest among the colored citizens than ever before. These folk are paying the rent of the colored club as well as the expenses of the entertainments given there, and the colored churches, too, are active in their cooperation with War Camp Community Service. And these are only a few of the communities.

34-4-204

Regarding appropriations for colored work for the budget period ending October 31st, 1918, over a hundred thousand dollars was appropriated for work with colored troops. However, due to the fact that these special appropriations were not made until late in July and in some cases not until September, it was not possible to undertake all the work included in the appropriations. Since November first $401,365.59 has been appropriated for work among colored troops. Of this amount $25,000 was given by the Rockefeller Foundation for a demonstration in connection with the work in Newport News. A summary of the appropriations shows that the following allowances have been made according to budget headings:

Office administration	$ 43,133.67
Club Work	289,238.92
Girls Work	55,486.00
Entertainment & Music	43,667.00
Singing	8,994.00
Athletic Supplies	2,533.00
Travelers Aid	9,435.00
Information Booth	4,550.00
Publicity	2,350.00
Colored Work Lodgings	2,000.00

The Service that War Camp Community Service rendered the colored soldier along parallel lines with that of the white soldier, is a great step toward a democratic conception of the needs of the colored race. If a definite structure of a betterment is raised in the future, War Camp Community Service has provided an excellent foundation upon which to build.

CHATEAU - THIERRY

The American efforts in the vicinity of Chateau-Thierry may be divided into three stages : first, helping to stop the German advance early in June 1918; second, the time that elapsed between the first and the third stages; and the third, which began with the Franco-American counter-offensive on July 18, 1918. The one day trip to Chateau-Thierry takes the visitor overonly that part of the field near the Paris-Chateau-Thierry road where fighting occurred between June 1 and July 21.

The first stage (June 1-4). The German advance, which began north of the Ailette the morning of May 27, was halted by the French and Americans along a line about thirteen kilometers west of the main road running from Soissons south to Chateau-Thierry on June 4. The Second American Division did very valuable work in helping to stop the Germans along the Paris-Chateau-Thierry road. The Seventh Machine Gun Battalion of the 3rd Division rendered great assistance in preventing the crossing of the Marne at the Chateau-Thierry ~~Br~~ Bridge during this advance.

The Second Stage (June 8 - July 17). To the west of Chateau-Thierry the operations consisted of a number of small local attacks and raids. During this time the Third Division sent a number of raiding parties across the river. This stage was brought to a close by the failure of the German Offensive of July 15-16-17. This was delivered to the east of Chateau-Thierry and was a very determined effort to push along the valley of the Surmelin River. In this operation the Third Division suffered very heavy losses from the German artillery fire. The Division, however held its ground well and only dropped back slightly when forced to do so by the withdrawal of the French on its right.

Early in June, the Second Division took over the line between the villages of Vaux inclusive and Bussiares exclusive and held it until relieved by the 26th American Division about July 10. During that time, they cleared the Germans out of Belleau Woods, Bois de la Roche and the villages of Vaux and Bourescbes.

The Third American Division held the line south of the Marne extending from Blesmes (four kilometers east of Chateau-Thierry) to a point two kilometers east of the village of Mezy. This sector was taken over early in June and held until the Division crossed the Marne and went forward in the general offensive of July 18.

The Third Stage (July 18-August 15). This stage began at 4.45 a.m., July 18 and lasted until our troops were finally brought to a halt south of the Vesle about August 15.

Through his Service of Information, Marshal Foch found that the Germans, in a desperate effort to have as many troops as possible along the Marne for their attack of July 15, were holding the line from the Aisne to Chateau-Thierry with only eleven divisions. He also had accurate information to the effect that an attack would be made between Chateau-Thierry and Reims about July 15. He then decided to leave south of the Marne only enough troops to hold the Germans back and to concentrate all of his other available troops between Chateau-Thierry and Soissons, and as soon as the engagement on the south side of the river was seriously strated he would start an attack between Soissons and Chateau-Thierry. He knew that if he could advance to the railroad and road running south from the Soissons railhead, he would cut the only practicable means of transporting supplies to troops in the salient. For this operation he was able to concentrate twenty French and American divisions. It was intended as a surprise attack. There was no artillery preparation before the Infantry attack. At 4.45 a.m. July 18, when the Infantry went over, the French and American artilleries opened up on every known German artillery position. The Germans were taken by surprise. The First Division crossed the road and railroad south of Soissons on July 21 and was relieved by a Scotch and a French Division on July 23. The Second Division took Tigny just west of this same road on July 19 and was relieved by a French Division that night. On July 20 the Germans began a general retreat from the Chateau-Thierry salient.

The 1st American Corps, under command of Lieut-General (then Major General) Hunter B. Liggett, began operating on July 4. The headquarters of the Corps were installed at La Ferté sous Jouarre. On that date, it was composed of the 167th French and the 2nd American divisions with the 26th (New England) Division in reserve. On July 10th the 2nd Division was relieved by the 26th Division and shortly afterwards moved to the neighborhood of Villers-Cotterets forest preparatory to taking part in the offensive of July 18. At this time, the 4th Division was in training in the area of Lizy-sur-Ourcq and the 28th (Pennsylvania) was training in the area of Mondovillers south of the Marne. Both of these divisions later took part in the offensive of July and August.

The 26th and 167th French Divisions, composing the 1st Corps, maintained contact with the Germans as far as the Forest of Fere, where on July 25, they were both relieved by the 42nd (Rainbow) Division. The 42nd Division had done very creditable work in withstanding the German offensive of July 15 in the sector east of Reims. The 42nd Division had pushed the Germans back as far as Mont St. Martin near the Vesle when it was relieved on August 3 by the 4th Division. The 4th Division was relieved by the 77th (New York Liberty) Division on August 10, along the south bank of the Vesle.

The 3rd Division forming a part of the 38th French Corps, crossed the Marne July 21 through Chateau-Thierry and Mont-St-Martin and reached the village of Cierges by Aug. 3, when it was relieved by one brigade of the 32nd (Wisconsin-Michigan) Division. The other brigade of that division relieved one brigade of the 28th (Pennsylvania) Division which had two days before relieved the French Division on the left of the 3rd Division. The 32nd Division took Fismes on August 4 but was unable to progress on the north bank of the Vesle. The 28th Division relieved the 32nd Division on August 7.

On August 4 the staff of the 4th American Corps relieved the staff of the 38th French Corps which had been directing the operations on the right of the First American Corps.

Clayo-Souilly

The town of Claye marks the point of extreme advance of the German cyclists sent out to reconnoiter the road to Paris in Sept.1914, when they were stopped by the French outposts at Claye. The Second Division passed through Clayo on May 31in French trucks on the way to Meaux.

Meaux.

On their retreat from Mons, the British reached Meaux on Sept.3, 1914. On Sept.3 at 11,30 a.m. the last train left Meaux for Paris and only about 2000 out of the former population of 14,000 inhabitants remained. On that day the English blew up Market bridge which spanned the Marne inside of the city. That afternoon the first German patrols appeared in Meaux and they remained until Sept.6,and at no time did they have any large number of troops in Meaux. The left of the German line rested on Meaux when the first battle of the Marne commenced on September 5,1914.

The Second Division which was in the vicinity of G'sors, just north of Paris undergoing a course of training received orders the night of May 30,1918, to entruck the following morning at 5.00 and proceed to Meaux where further instructions would be received. The foot troops of the Division passed in camions through the northern outskirts of Paris about midday. The artillery and horse drawn vehicles were to travel by rail and by and by marching. It was only when the troops arrived at Meaux that they began to realize what was happening. The town was filled with refugees who had come from the invaded districts. The people of Meaux showered our men with flowers as they looked to them to hold the Germans out of their town previously occupied by them in 1914. From Meaux, the long truck column proceeded north to the vicinity of May-en-Moultier which they reached at dusk. The road was packed all the way with refugees. French Cavalry were in the fields on both sides going towards the front. The original instructions were that the Division would be put in line somewhere in this vicinity, but due to the overchanging situation, it was ordered to proceed at once to Montreuil-aux-Lions via Lizy-sur-Ourcq.

Trilport

German troops occupied Trilport on Sept.4,1914 and on that day the retreating English blew up the bridge at the west end of the town. Trilport was the headquarters of the 6th French Army during June and July 1918. The 1st American Corps was a part of the 6th French Army during the operations around Chateau-Thierry in July.

La Ferté-sous-Jouarre.

On Sept. 3,1914, the retreating English destroyed the two bridges over the Marne at La Ferté. The Headquarters of the 1st American Corps were located at La Ferté in June and July 1918, in the Chateau of Condo. About 75 yards south of the bridge of La Ferte are two restaurants where meals are served. This town was the railhead for the Second Division, and the road over which the Visitors pass towards Montreuil was the main supply route. Coming from the line east of Reims the 42nd Division rested at La Ferté from July 23rd to 25th preparatory to relieving the 26th Division.

Montreuil-aux-Lyons.

The infantry of the Second Division a rrived here during the afternoon of June 1st. The Mairie which is on the south side of the Paris-Metz highway as the Visitor passes through was occupied as Division Headquarters. The day was sultry and hotbut the men were in good spirits in spite of their forced march of the past twenty-four hours. They had been bombed during the night by German planes. The orders were that the Division should take up a position in line just behind the tired and hard-pressed French troops who had retreated all the way from the Aisne. The Brigade of Marines occupied a position along the north side of the main road and the Third Brigade got in line south of the road. Both brigades left the main road at Montreuil preparatory to taking their positions.

Lucy-le-Bocage.

After leaving Montreuil-aux-Lyons the visitors proceed along the Paris-Metz road six kilometers to cross roads just south of Lucy-le-Bocage and turn to the left (north) on road which leads into the town, which was used as a Regimental headquarters for the 6th Regiment of Marines for some time. It was also the location of the Supply and Ammunition Dump of the Marines. It was along the line from Lucy-le-Bocage to Champillon that the Marines first met the Germans on June 2. By June 4 the few remaining French had fallen through our lines completely worn out.

~~Champillon~~

Marigny

Veuilly-la-Poterie

On June 1, the 23 Infantry had gone into the divisional reserve area in the Bois of Bezu-Guery and Vertolet Farm when orders were received that same night to fill a gap between two French Corps, in the region of Colombes. At dawn, the morning of the June 2nd, the 23rd Infantry, reinforced by one battalion of Marines made a flank march and took up a position from Veuilly to Gaudelu. This position was held until June 4, when the 23rd Infantry was relieved and took up a position from a point just southwest of Boureschos to Le Thiolet inclusive.

Bussiares.

This village marks the left of the sector held by the 2nd Division It was held by the Germans until July 18.

Torcy

Torcy was taken by the 26th Division very shortly after the launching of the attack of July 18.

Belleau Woods.

The visitors stop at the cemetery on the road from Belleau to Bouroseches to make a short walk through the woods over the ground where the fighting which drove the Germans from the woods took place. The north edge of the woods was finally taken by the Marines on June 25, and after this date the Germans never got back into the woods. The military value of these woods can easily be seen as that ground dominates the surrounding country.

Boureschos.

Boureschos was taken on June 6th by the Marines who also made an attack that same day on Belleau Woods where they succeeded in making slight progress. The Germans retained possession of the railroad station in Bouroseches which they had organized as a strong point. The 23rd Infantry attacked on the right of the Marines and improved their positions somewhat. Both these attacks met with heavy machine gun resistance in the wheatfields and in the woods and the Americans suffered heavy casualties. About June 12, Boureseches was taken over by the 23rd Infantry. The town was frequently bombarded after the Americans occupied it. The Germans were not driven out of the railroad station until July 18 when the troops of the 26th Division in the town of Belleau delivered flanking fire on the station.

Vaux.

In going from Boureschos to Vaux the Visitors pass along the old German line and trenches. Vaux was held by the Germans until July 1, when two battalions of the Third Brigade, one battalion being from the 9th Infantry and the other from the 23rd Infantry took the village of Vaux and the Bois de la Roche just northwest of Vaux. Vaux was actually taken by the battalion of the 9th Infantry and the Bois do la Roche was taken by the Battalion of the 23rd Infantry. The bombardment of Vaux was started by our artillery at 8.00 a.m., assisted by the French artillery, and lasted until 6.00 p.m. when the Infantry went forward from the little ravine running down in front of the Bois do la Marette to Hill 204 behind Vaux. The French were to take Hill 204 during the attack but they were unable to do so. This left Hill 204 in German hands while our troops held Vaux. The attack was very well planned and the Americans carried out their program according to schedule. At 6.00 p.m. the infantry went over the top behind a rolling barrage and quickly gained all of its objectives. By means of the inhabitants who had fled from Vaux the Intelligence Section had been able to carefully locate all cellars in Vaux where the Germans could take refuge.

Detachments of the 9th Infantry were detailed to "mop up" these different cellars. The town was taken in just a few minutes and the 9th Infantry suffered very few casualties. In Vaux we took about 150 prisoners and some machine guns. In the Bois de la Roche the 23rd Infantry suffered rather heavy casualties from machine gun fire. In the combined operation, we took 500 prisoners, many machine guns and a number of trench mortars. The Germans tried to counterattack on the ground taken by the 9th Infantry, but in doing so they lost practically two companies which were raked in by our barrage.

Chateau-Thierry.

Chateau-Thierry was not very badly damaged by shell fire. At the time they evacuated the city, the Germans removed anything of value that they found in the houses. In the July offensive the fighting in the town was not violent as the Germans withdrew to avoid being cut off by the troops attacking south of the Aisne. The concrete bridge spanning the Marne was destroyed by the French after their last troops withdrawn to the south bank early in June under the protection of the fire of the Seventh Machine Gun Battalion of the Third American Division. The party then goes up to the high ground just north of the city and from there one gets a wonderful view of the valley of the Marne. At the Hotel du Cygne, on the south side of the river in Chateau-Thierry, the Visitors can get a very good table-d'hote luncheon for about 6 Francs.

Black Reconstruction

One singular and psychological fact about the South was that during the war and for sometime after, it had no talking point, no rallying point for enthusiasm and moral uplift. Before the war, it had. Slavery, not simply slavery as a fact, but as a system, a new system; a new solution of the labor problem, a great imperial push into a new and powerful realm. During the war, especially as the South discovered that the world was not back of it, and did not believe it, and that the economic facts upon which slavery had builded and protected, were false and wrong, it shifted its ground to a particularistic defense of home rule, state rights. That, of course, was too vague a cry to arouse the masses, so that the South still had few songs and was beaten back to personal hatred and poignant personal loss. Then, over it, hovered sorrow in the shape of fear, the shadow of regret and loss, the whole doctrine of particularism was swept away by the war never to return. For a time, the South looked back to the old arrogance of Toombs, the dictatorial swagger which was going to practically restore slavery under another name, and tread the old economic path again. But that path was no longer there, and while the South was searching for new moral slogans, and words to put upon its war monuments, which would carry convictions, suddenly there came race and Negro. The South became protagonist of a race formula which the pre-war South would have laughed at. They did not have to prove white peoples superior to Negroes. They knew it. It was manifest to anyone who looked. But the post-war South had to prove it, and they entered upon a propaganda which spread over the world and became the basis for the new imperial aggression which carried to dizzy heights of power that very economic religion which the whole slavery South was fighting before the Civil War.

ADDITIONAL CORRECTIONS

GALLEY 245, end of the second paragraph, add after the words Charles Wesley.

"Beale simply does not take Negroes into account in the critical year of 1866."

GALLEY 121, Chapter X, at the bottom of the page on which this chapter begins, I would like the following to appear as a note in small type:

Note: Orthodox Marxians will object that the phrase "Dictatorship of the Black Proletariat" is not technically correct, since the political dictators of South Carolina were not clearly conscious of a design to conduct the state solely in the interests of the laboring class. I nevertheless maintain that while such a conscious plan was impossible at the time, nevertheless, there were sufficient indications of effort toward such a plan to justify the use of the phrase.

Is true Freedom but to break
Fetters for our own dear sake,
And with leathern hearts forget
That we owe mankind a debt?

James Russell Lowell

Just then from the doorway, as fat as shotes
Came the cake-walk princes in their long red coats,
Canes with a brilliant lacquer shine,
And tall silk hats that were red as wine.
And they pranced with their butterfly partners there,
Coal-black maidens with pearls in their hair,
Knee-skirts trimmed with the jassamine sweet,
And bells on their ankles and little black feet.
And the couples railed at the chant and the frown
Of the witch-men lean, and laughed them down.

Vachel Lindsay

Blow out, you bugles, over the rich Dead!
There's none of these so lonely and poor of old,
But, dying, has made us rarer gifts than gold.
These laid the world away; poured out the red Sweet wine of youth; gave up the years to be
Of work and joy, and that unhoped serene
That men call age; and those who would have been
Their sons they gave, their immortality.

Rupert Brooke

The staggering force of brutish might,
That strikes and leaves us stunned and dazed;
The long vain waiting through the night
To hear some voice for justice raised.

James Weldon Johnson.

Oh, kinsmen! We must meet the common foe!
Though far outnumbered let us still be brave,
And for their thousand blows deal one death-blow!
What though before us lies the open grave?
Like men we'll face the murderous, cowardly pack,

Claude McKay 44-E1

Gone, gone,—sold and gone,
To the rice-swamp dank and lone.
Oh, when weary, sad, and slow,
From the fields at night they go,
Faint with toil, and racked with pain,
To their cheerless homes again,
There no brother's voice shall greet them,
There no father's welcome meet them.

Gone, gone,—sold and gone,
To the rice-swamp dank and lone,
From Virginia's hills and waters;
Woe is me, my stolen daughters!

I am a Southerner;
I love the South; I dared for her
To fight from Lookout to the sea,
With her proud banner over me.
But from my lips thanksgiving broke,
As God in battle-thunder spoke,
And that Black Idol, breeding drouth
And dearth of human sympathy
Throughout the sweet and sensuous South,
Was, with its chains and human yoke,
Blown hellward from the cannon's mouth,
While Freedom cheered behind the smoke!

Negroes complained to employer about being under paid.

"Rice lands now rent at ten dollars an acre, and cotton from two to three." p 107

"We were now giving (1868-69) 12 dollars a month, with rations, half the money being paid at the end of every month, and the rest, at the end of the year. P. 127

In Autumn of 1873, Mrs. Leight and her husband decided to bring back to American some English laborers. There was a labor crisis among the agriculturist in England at the time and these laborers were to take the places of the Irish on Butter Island in Georgia. Eight agreed to go, and a contract made for three years, with high wages.

The Englishmen proved very poor. They became sick, troublesome and discontented, were constantly drunk, and "shirked their work so abominably" that the Negro foreman "begged that they might not be allowed to work in the same fields with his Negroes, to whom they set so bad an example, by leaving before their day's work was finished, that the demoralized his gang completely, and made them grumble at being obliged to go with their work after the "white men" had left so when the end of their second year came we were most thankful to pay their way back to England and get rid of them. 202-207

Chinese labor considered - Negroes desire Chinese, 1869. Pp146-7

Chinese laborers were being considered for work on the rice plantations in lieu of the Negroes. There was a general move in this direction in all of the Southern states. The Pacific railway had opened up into the South which made it easy for Chinese to reach the plantations.

The Negro newspaper in Charleston published an article encouraging the introduction of Chinese into the section because they could become servants of the Negroes and the latter would no longer have to work themselves.

Negroes become defiant towards Employer 1869; p 131-2

"The Negroes this year and the following seemed to reach the climax of lawless independence, and I never slept without a loaded pistol by my bed. Their whole manner was changed, they took to calling their former owners by their last name without any title before it....dropped the pleasant term of mistress; took to calling me 'Miss Fanny', walked about with guns on their shoulders, worked just as much and when they pleased, and tried speaking to me with their hats on, or not touching them to me when they passed me on the banks.

Negro is the best laborer if treated properly

I have noticed that, when a cotton-planter is embarrassed, in debt, and not making money, he is very apt to think that "the Negro don't work". ...But wherever I have found a planter who managed well, and had sufficient capital to carry on his operations, he was successful, and was also well satisfied with the Negro".

Most planters give this answer concerning the Negro as a worker:

"If you pay him regularly, cash in hand, and do not attempt to sell him anything, but let him trade elsewhere, and if you deal fairly with him, he is the best laborer you can get, and you can always keep him."

31-12c-29

Negro earns but saves little. Ga. Negro more prosperous
Nordhoff, 21

"The black laborer earns enough, but he does not save his money. In the heart of the cotton country, a Negro depending on his own labor alone, with the help of his wife in the picking season, may live and have from $75 to $125 clear money in hand at the close of the season. If he has several half-grown boys able to help him in the field, he may support his family during the year, and have from $175 to $200 clear money at the year's end."..... He thrives on corn-meal and bacon, and has few doctor's bills to pay. Unfortunately---very few lay by their earnings; yet the deposits in the Freedmen's Bank showed how very considerable were the savings of the few; and.....the criminal mismanagement of this trust...has given a fresh impetus to the spendthrift habits of the blacks...In Democratic Georgia,....the Negroes pay tax this year on over seven millions of property of which nearly 400,000 acres are real estate." ....They are found of owning an acre or a house lot.

Negro as a laborer, receives fair share of crop. Nordhoff 20-21

"The Negro, in the main, is industrious. Free labor is an undoubted success in the South. In Georgia he owns already nearly 400,000 acres of farming real estate, besides city property. The Negro works; he raises cotton and corn, sugar and rice, and it is infinitely to his credit that he continues to do so, and, according to universal testimony, works more steadfastly and effectively this year than ever before since 1865, in spite of the political hurly-burly in which he has lived for the last ten years."

Nor ought we of the North to forget that a part of the credit of the Negro's industry today is due to the Southern planters, who have been wise enough to adapt themselves to the tremendous change in the abour system, and honest enough not to discourage the ignorant free laborer y wronging him of his earnings or by drawing unjust bargains with him."

"The system of planting shares -- tends to make the laborer independent nd self-helpful, by throwing him on his own resources."

".....the black man gets a fair share of the crop he makes. If anywhere e suffers wrong, it is at the hands of poor farmers, who cultivate a thin oil, and are themselves poor and generally ignorant.

Negroes in North Carolina use share crop system chiefly. Nordhoff 99

"In the cotton country a few Negroes rent land outright,-- and then pay from three to seven dollars per acre. The commoner way is to rent 2b acres, for which, on strong land, he pays 1600 pounds of lint, or unginned cotton. Others plant on shares, and give the planter one-third of the corn and one quarter of the cotton. In this case the Negro has his own mule. If the planter furnished the mule, the Negro receives sometimes one-third or one-quarter of the crop and a meat ration. Where they serve for wages, they receive from ten to twelve dollars a month and a ration consisting of five pounds of bacon and a bushel of meal. Where the Negro works for wages, he tries to keep his wife at home. If he rents land, or plants on shares, the wife and children help him in the field."

Very few Negroes in North Carolina owned a working mule. Nordoff 99

"An intelligent Republican told me that he though not one in ten of the agricultural Negroes owned a working mule. This shows them to be poorer than their fellows in the South-western states; but they have here a much poorer soil, and have to spend some money for manure."

Negroes receive $15.00 per month as a tobacco hand. Appear to be prosperous in North Carolina

4.....Bibliography (Mr. Bacote)

"A good hand in the tobacco country receives fifteen dollars per month. In all cases they have a cabin, land enough for a vegetable garden, usually Saturday afternoon to work it with the use of the mule and plow. Some planters believed that at least half the agricultural force (Negro) in the State worked for wages."

"There are many colored mechanics, and they are all thrifty people, and very commonly own the houses they live in, and often a town lot besides. In the cotton country, an increasing number of color men own farms of from forty to a hundred acres, but many of these were free before the war. In the towns and villages the colored people have a prosperous look; they dress neatly, and very commonl live in frame houses. On the whole, their condition appears to me very comfortable and satisfactory."

31-12 d -3/

Negroes property yield in Georgia greater than that of any other Southern State

"....In an official report of the comptroller-general of the State for 1874, giving the character and value of property and amount of taxes returned by colored tax-payers for that year. The number of colored polls listed was 83,318. These returned an aggregate value of taxable property amounting to $6,157,798, on which they actually paid $30,788 in taxes. They owned 338,769 acres of agricultural land, and city and town property to the amount of $1,200,115. Now, remembering that these people were slaves only nine years before....I think it clearly establishes that, first, they have labored with creditable industry and perseverance and, second, that they have been fairly protected in the rights of life and property by the Democratic rulers of the State. I do not think the colored people in any other State I have visited own half as much real estate, or indeed, a quarter as much, as those of Georgia."

Negroes in Georgia are spendthrifts according to the"National Republican" of Atlanta. A Republican and colored organ. Nordhoff 105

Negroes worse off now after ten years of freedom than they were in slavery. Drink too much. "Thousands spend a dollar for whiskey through the week, and on the Sabbath put a nickel or nothing in the contribution box. The freedmen of Georgia spent in a half year as much as they paid for schools since emancipation....One show here last winter is said to have carried away $3,000 of the colored people's money - more than their voluntary contributions to schools in this city since 1865.....This year taxes will be paid on an aggregate of $7,000,000 of property, or less than $15 a head.... They have probably earned from $35,000,000 to $45,000,000 a year, and out of it should have saved a large percentage. But there has been improvidence and waste on every hand."

Negro Mechanics etc. live near towns - prosperous in Georgia. Nordhoff.10

The Negroes in and near the cities and towns are usually prosperous. There are many colored mechanics, and they recieve full wages where they are skillful. Near Atlanta and other places they own small "Truckfarms", and supply the market with vegetables. There are fewer black than white beggars in the cities, and a missionary clergyman suprised me by the remark that the blackberry crop, which was ripening, was a blessing to dozens of poor white families whom he knew," who lived half the year, he said, in a condition of semi-starvation. He said that these people would not only sell blackberries but that in the season they largely lived on this fruit. These are the kind of people to whom factories would be a blessing.

Negro Wages in the Cotton fields of Georgia. Nordhoff. 106

"In the cotton country the planter usually pays his hands ten dollars a month, by the year, with a house and ration. The ration consists of three pounds of bacon, a peck of meal, and a pint of molasses per week. The laborer also has a "patch" of land for a garden, and Saturday afternoon for himself, with the use of the planter's mules and tools to work the garden.....The cotton pickers receive fifty cents per hundred pounds in the seed, and are fed; or sixty five cents per one hundred pounds, if they feed themselves. The rations cost about fifteen cents a day.".....

"....The women receive for field work six dollars a month and a ration."

31-12c-33

Negroes leaving Georgia - due to non-productivity of soil and the lien law. Nordhoff - 108-109

Many people of both races (estimated at 25,000 of each race) left Georgia because of the wornout condition of the soil. Negroes immigrated to Arkansas, Louisiana, and Mississippi.

The liew law caused many to leave. Caused much discontent among them. Many Negroes felt that they could do better elsewhere.

In the far southern counties the crops were exposed to the attacks of insects.

Georgia's failures in 1875 greater than any of the southern states - according to a mercantile report in an Augusta journal. Nordhoff 110

The business failures in Georgia in the last six months (Jan to June 1875) amounted to the sum of $2,956,215 - a loss greater than that of any southern state. The following figures show the report of failures from other states.

Ala.....$523,000	Fla.....235,000	La....630,000
Ark.....211,000	Ga.....2,956,000	Miss...1,045,000

Tennessee.....325,000 Texas..1,153,000
Va. and W. Va....$1,383,000

The liabilities of Georgia more than any other Southern State and of many Northern. Nordhoff 110

The liabilities of Georgia amounted to nearly one-third of the liabilities of the twelve states; the liabilities of Georgia and South Carolina together amounted to nearly half the liabilities of the entire South. Georgia compared as follows with other States.

Indiana.....$1,860,000
Iowa..... 436,000
Kentucky..... 2,456,000
Missouri.....2,328,000

New Orleans has many Negro skilled laborers. Many own homes. In the parish, Negroes mostly renters. Nordhoff 72

"New Orleans has a considerable number of colored mechanics,.... elsewhere in the State I have seen colored men working as masons and carpenters, and occasionally shoe-makers, and they are skilful blacksmiths....In the towns a considerable number of the colored people own the houses in which they live, and they all have a strong desire...to own small lots of land. But in the parish which has a large Negro population of over twelve thousands, a planter who has taken much interest in the colored people told me he knew not more than twenty men who owned farms, and some of these he thought would not make their payments on the price, by reason of improvidence."

"The women---received from eight dollars to ten dollars a month as field hands."

COLOR AND DEMOCRACY: COLONIES AND PEACE

COLOR AND DEMOCRACY COLONIES AND PEACE

by

W. E. Burghardt Du Bois

DUMBARTON OAKS

If we arrange the proposals made at Dumbarton Oaks in accordance with conventional lines of race and color, we have a government of the world in which some five hundred million white and yellow people will rule mankind through a Security Council with military power to enforce its decisions. Over half of this number, however, belong to the yellow race and because of the economic and political disruption of China, as well as for other historic reasons, this half will undoubtedly long be under the control of white people.

A proposal for equality of races at least in theory was made by Japan to the League of Nations and is said to have been proposed by China at Dumbarton Oaks. No action was taken in either case.

About one thousand million people, mostly but not entirely white folk, will function in the Assembly which will have rights of petition, discussion and advice, and action in so far as the Security Council allows. Here again many of these so-called free nations are under the economic domination of the great powers and will scarcely be able to take an independent stand.

The Assembly will choose representatives of six nations to be associated with the great powers in the Security Council, but their status and power will depend largely upon whether this Council makes decisions by majority vote, or by two-thirds, or requires in certain cases unanimity.

There will be at least six hundred million colored and black folk inhabiting colonies owned by white nations, who will have no rights which the white people of the world are bound to respect. Revolt on their part can be put down by military force; they will have no right of appeal to the Council or Assembly; they will have no standing before the International Court of Justice. Any dispute concerning their status lies beyond the jurisdiction of either the Council or the Assembly. Nothing is said concerning international control of minority rights.

An Economic and Social Council will be set up by the Assembly to consider human rights and social uplift. On this Council no colony will have representation and no minority groups as such. How far the Council can investigate conditions and make public its findings, is not clear; nor are its general functions outlined save in vague and indefinite ways.

For the enemy states, guilty of imperialism and aggression in this war, and comprising between one hundred and two hundred millions of peoples, nothing is said. Presumably they will at some time take their place among the free nations and some of them among the great powers.

Evidently the weak point in this outline of government of men is the fact that something between a fourth and half of the inhabitants of the world will, under this proposal, have no part init; no power of democratic control and scarcely an organized right of petition. Most efforts at reform and social uplift will depend upon the free states and they will be asked to act at a time when, because of the loss and disruption of war, they will be l ast likely to face philanthropic enterprise of any sort.

Chapter II

THE DISFRANCHISED COLONIES

Let us now scan more carefully the plight of colonial peoples. It is characteristic that first of all we cannot with scientific precision state the exact number of persons in the colonies. Careful censuses have never been taken, and we must depend upon estimate and guesswork. First, we may regard them from the point of view of the imperial powers which own them. If we exclude from their ranks autonomous white nations like Canada, Australia and New Zealand, we have 495 million colored people ruled by 50 million whites in the United Kingdom of Great Britain. Next in order comes Japan where before the war 73 million yellow people ruled 68 million others. France with 38 million ruled 71 million colored folk. Nine million white inhabitants of the Netherlands ruled 67 million colored people in southeast Asia. The United States of North America with its 130 million people ruled 19 million colored people, including the Philipines. Belgium with 8½ million white people ruled 10½ million blacks in the Belgian Congo and 7½ million white people in Portugal ruled 11 million in Africa and a few in Asia.

96-2-249

Or we may put the situation this way: each British subject rules ten colonials; each Dutch citizen rules between eight and nine colonials; in France, Japan, Portugal and Belgium each citizen rules a little more than one colonial. In the case of the United States alone the number of colonials ruled is much smaller than the number of citizens.

Mere numbers do not, of course, give the whole figure. A much more revealing study would give the history and characteristics of the people, the extent and kind of land and materials. But such studies have been made rarely and by piece-meal and we know comparatively little of the total industrial and financial arrangements of colonial organization. We can only say that half of the area of the world is in colonies owned and dominated by the whites.

Again it is by no means clear to the ordinary student as to just why colonies exist and persist. In the past, of course, colonies were cases of migration and expansion of frontiers. Then they became matters of political domination for the sake of taxation and trade. Finally, in our day, colonies are predominantly matters of capital investment.

This is not generally understood. Much has been said for instance of the fact that colonies do not pay the mother country in the sense that usually the payments of the mother country to the colony exceeds the returns of the colony to the country which owns it. Why then does the mother country not only wish to retain the colonies but is willing to fight expensive wars for such retention and for increasing the colonial area? The answer to this has often been that raw material in colonial regions is of such value that countries must control it in order to retain their "place in the sun". But here again it has been shown that only three per cent of the more valuable raw materials of the world are in colonial areas.

The answer to all this seeming paradox is the fact that colonies are areas for the investment of capital in which the investor can make a rate of profit far beyond that which comes to him in domestic ventures. Profit in home industry is being increasingly limited by organized labor; by the demand for higher wages and shorter hours; by limitation of the labor of children and women, and by other devices for diverting the profit of the investor and property owner to the income of the wage earner.

On the other hand, in colonial regions the investor is part of government or has large influence with the government, and can secure labor at the lowest wage and the longest hours, and can evade taxation and profit limiting legislation. Not only that but he can put upon the shoulders of taxpayers at home, colonial payments and improvements, especially by long term investments like roads and habors, which will increase his profit.

Not until we face the fact that colonies are a method of investment yielding unusual returns, will we realize that the colonial system is a part of the battle between capital and labor in modern economy. This profit has been the foundation of much of modern wealth, luxury and power; and the envious competition to dominate colonial fields of industrial enterprise led to the first World War and was a prime cause of the second World War. Its vicious influence was attacked by the legislation which established the Mandates Commission in the League of Nations; but this proved abortive because the Commission was denied all real power.

Attempted sanctions against Italy in the beginning of the second World War, again failed because of the sympathy which her colonial ambitions aroused in England, France, and America. Then arose another phase of colonial competition: Japan was determined to supplant Europe as the chief exploiter of Asiatic labor and materials. Thus a new and vast social problem in the guise of race rivalry in Asiatic investment came into the picture and remains there threateningly today.

The depressed standards of living in colonial areas, the poverty, disease and ignorance are an enduring threat to civilization backed by the insatiable demand for high profit in commerce and industry.

Chapter III

THE UNFREE PEOPLES

The phrase, "Free peoples" as used in the Dumbarton Proposals, is based upon the theory that the United Nations are predominantly democratic with enjoyment in great degree of the four freedoms of the Atlantic Charter. As a matter of fact, of course, few peoples are free in this sense. In the first place there are groups and classes, who because of their income live in a degree of poverty which makes it impossible for them to take any effective part in democratic procedure. This is true to a great degree in England, France and Italy; to a lesser degree in Scandinavia and the United States; and even in the United States, the number of people who live with an income below the limit of proper subsistence, composes a major part of the nation.

Then there are groups like the American Negroes in the United States, the Jews in Poland and the Balkans, the Indians in much of South America and other peoples, who are not allowed to participate in the democratic process or in the cultural development of their homelands, because of deliberate discrimination in law and custom. They are consequently to a large degree poor, sick and ignorant and constitute social problems of varying size and texture.

In addition to this, many of the so-called free countries like Ethiopia, Liberia, Haiti, the Dominican Republic; and the states of Central America and the Countries of the Balkans, together with a large proportion of the countries of the Near East, form what we may call quasi-colonies: their labor and material being so dominated by invested capital from abroad, that whatever political independence or democratic expression they have in theory, in practice they are under the domination of the great investing countries.

Here again exact data as to the degree and extent of this domination are difficult to obtain. We know that many countries of recognized independence like Venezuela, Brasil, Portugal and Spain are to a less degree than those mentioned, but still very decidedly, dominated by foreign owners of invested capital. The Community, therefore, of free nations where democracy prevails or will prevail in the near future is ominously limited. One country stands out as an extraordinary example of this and that is the Union of South Africa. Here a little group of two million whites absolutely dominate the lives and fortunes of eight million black natives; and yet this country poses as one of the free nations fighting for democracy. In fact its whole internal economy is dominated by the owners of gold, diamonds and copper mines and of other industries, who live in England and the United States.

Chapter IV

THE DANGER TO PEACE

We are seeking desperately to save modern civilization from repetition of two disastrous and world-wide wars. We hope to do this by a union of nations who will collectively organize to stop aggressive action on the part of other nations with selfish programs or programs incompatible with reasonable human progress. For a time it seemed as though the main protagonists of the new order thus united were nations which professed and followed the democratic method of government and that they were fighting against two or three dictatorships where the power of great nations had been concentrated in the hands of a few leaders backed by organized power and determined to dominate the world.

Unfortunately this theoretical pattern is not altogether true to fact. As we have pointed out the united free nations in the first place own colonies with some six hundred millions of people and occupy perhaps one half the area of the earth for whom there is at present no definite plan of spreading democracy and lifting the standards of life out of poverty, ignorance and sickness. In addition to this there are a mass of people living within the free nations and others in nations that are not really free, whose government and social status is dominated by current demands for individual profit in organized industry and commerce.

There is consequently not only the danger of eventual colonial revolt, of class struggle and minority discontent; but the continual danger of that rivalry for the distribution of profit among dominant nations which has already caused two world wars in the present, as well as being a major cause of endless wars in the past; and a temptation to murder, destruction and disorder in the future.

In addition to that, no matter how thoroughly and widely we may in the present war conquer Germany and Japan, we still have the welfare of over one hundred million people in these countries to face and satisfy with the program adopted to the best interests of normal human beings. Any refusal to face these problems; to evade the problem of colonies; to forget injustice to minorities; to deny the rising struggle between economic classes; and above all to deal frankly and openly with the question of private profit and government control in industry is to make impossible a solution of the problem of world peace.

Chapter V

DANGER TO DEMOCRACY

In the most democratic of modern countries, democracy has not worked satisfactorily. Poverty with its accompanying problems of ignorance, sickness and crime, remain major problems in every leading country of modern civilization. Unless these problems are sincerely and frankly faced and solutions attempted for their settlement, there can be no satisfactory development of the democratic ideal.

This was illustrated in the late presidential election in the United States. As an expression of intelligent public opinion its results were made indeterminate by the situation in the South. The former slave states with their illiteracy, sickness, poverty and crime, not only among the children of freedmen but too largely among the whites, have made it impossible since the Civil War to get an honest and intelligent expression of public opinion from this part of the nation. Consequently a block of one hundred and thirty-four electoral votes is quadrennially delivered to one party, in defiance of law and justice. This must not be allowed to continue. The South must be educated and healed, the income of its workers increased or our democratic methods will continue to be crippled.

There is evidence in England, Belgium and France, in Mexico and Canada and in the United States, of a determination of laboring masses to consolidate and use their political power for social ends. This trend to the leftward is shown by legislation for social security, for health, for minimum wage standards and improved conditions of labor, for government ownership and control and conduct of property and income for purposes of social welfare rather than individual wealth. The problem, therefore, is how far in this reorganization of the world, democratization of industry can be peacefully increased and developed without internal revolution and without international war.

Chapter VI

RUSSIA

The central country to be considered in this reorganization of the world is Russia; and this is not simply because Russia has followed Marxian communism or sought to control religious organization or preached the inevitability of revolution; but more especially because Russia is an astounding example of the rise of the common man in modern times. For a century or more the Russian mujik was bracketed with the Negro slave and the Latin peasant as the most stupid and unhopeful of modern men. It was pointed out that the rule of the Russian czar and aristocracy was absolutely necessary in a country do dismally ignorant and unprogressive as Russia. Despite this in a revolution which after abortive attempts came to partial success in 1917, we have had an extraordinary uplifting of a whole nation; a nation has been taught to read and write, to organize industry, to heal its sickness and suppress its crime; and above all so to reorganize its industry and internal economy, as to make a larger number of Russians comfortable and happy than ever before in the long history of that nation.

This is a proof of the democratic ideal of which most people do not think. Democracy is not simply the self-defense of the competent; it is the unloosing of energies and capabilities of the depressed. This is what Russia is accomplishing in her own land. She has withstood the armed onslaught of Europe and America; she has beaten back Nazi Germany and is now cooperating with the United Nations. The future of Russia holds two possibilities: the first is that her admission to full fellowship with the capital-exporting and technically efficient countries of western Europe and America, will make her a party with them in the exploitation not only of working classes but especially of those working classes in colonial areas. This would bring in Russia as co-exploiter and dominant power in Asia.

The second alternative is that Russia, clinging tenaciously to her program of socialized wealth, should refuse to be beguiled or tempted by either England or America; should refuse to have her armed forces used for the restoration of the British Empire in Asia or for the establishment of a new American empire in the Pacific; should have no part in the exploitation of laboring classes in any colonial area or in any of the leading countries, and after developing capital for her own industries should consent to export it only under conditions which would insure the ends of social uplift and not of individual wealth or national power politics.

Chapter VII

MISSIONARIES AND MANDATES

It is clear that in this world as manifested by these terrible wars and by the suffering of mankind and the sacrifice of people, there is a tremendous available amount of goodwill and desire for the uplift of mankind. This has been shown in the past in all sorts of ways: in the charity and philanthropy of the medieval church; in the Christian missions of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries; in the suppression of slavery and the slave trade; and in the various attempts to alleviate, if not abolish poverty and to do away with ignorance.

The difficulty today and at this particular era is that this goodwill must be organized and canalized. It must not be used like the missionary effort in Africa to exploit and subdue peoples for the use of profit-making industry and in the name of Jesus Christ. It must, on the other hand, become organized as missions of culture to carry to backward peoples, minority groups and lower economic classes, the culture and intelligence which they are capable of absorbing and using. It must narrow the frightful and dangerous difference between current custom and scientific proof that there are no races and great groups incapable of the same kind of advance made by the most cultured peoples; and that what is needed is opportunity; that we can only have democracy and peace, if the menace of poverty, ignorance and crime are met by positive and organized human action; and of this triumvirate, poverty is the greatest menace.

Poverty can be attacked and abolished by government action and social organization. The way to make this clear to the world is to attack the economic illiteracy, the ignorance of economic facts and developments now deliberately encouraged in our schools and colleges, in our press and periodicals and in our books. Here is the field for the great crusade which will lead to democracy and peace.

Chapter V

~~THE DANGER TO~~ PEACE on Colonies

90

~~THIS CHAPTER ASKS IF~~ PEACE ~~IS~~ POSSIBLE BY FORCE IN THE HANDS OF THE WORLD'S GREAT NATIONS, SO LONG AS THESE NATIONS IN THE MAIN, FOLLOW THE PLAN OF IMPERIAL CONTROL OF COLONIAL PEOPLES AND OF OTHERS WHO HAVE NO EFFECTIVE VOICE IN GOVERNMENT.

We are seeking desperately to save modern civilization from repetition of two disastrous and world-wide wars. We hope to do this by a union of nations who will collectively organize to stop aggressive action on the part of other nations with selfish programs or programs incompatible with reasonable human progress. For a time it was argued that the main protagonists of the new order thus united were nations which professed and followed the democratic method of government and that they were fighting against two or three dictatorships where the power of great nations had been concentrated in the hands of a few leaders backed by organized power and determined to dominate the world.

Unfortunately this theoretical pattern as the last chapter has shown is not altogether true to fact. As we have pointed out the united free nations in the first place own colonies with some six hundred millions of people and occupy perhaps one third the area of the earth ~~among whom~~ where there is at present no definite plan of spreading democracy and lifting the standards of life out of poverty, ignorance and sickness. In addition to this there are a mass of people living within the free nations and others in nations that are not really free, whose government and social status is is dominated by current demands for individual profit in organized industry and commerce.

There is consequently not only the danger of eventual colonial revolt, of class struggle and minority discontent; but the continual danger of that rivalry for the distribution of profit among dominant nations which has already caused two world wars in the present, as well as being a partial cause of endless wars in the past; and a temptation to murder, destruction and disorder in the future. It is, of course, impossible to determine with accuracy the causes of particular wars. Just because war is not rational there are many threads interwoven to make the fabric of dissension, organized murder and destruction. But back of the history of the Eighteenth, Nineteenth and even the Seventeenth century we can see how national defense and group self-expression gradually became transformed as the Industrial Revolution was ushered in by the new capitalism; and the annexation of territory came more and more to be confined and aimed at the annexation of certain kinds of territory; that is, of territory inhabited by "lesser" peoples, of territory rich in the possibilities of exploitation.

In the Seven Years War which became a world war some of these new patterns were evident and in the continuous war between Europe and Asia which resulted in the subjugation of India, the new colonialism was born. In Africa from the investment imperialism which subdued Egypt and North Africa there was developed the missionary imperialism of the Congo Free State and the Congress of Berlin. Fire and blood swept over Africa in continuous flood from the beginning of the Nineteenth Century until well into the Twentieth. There was increased effort, however, to keep ~~confined~~ the wars against the natives of Asia and Africa, to limits where they would not set aflame the peoples of Europe in their relations to each other.

Throughout the Napoleonic wars this danger was faced and partially averted. It was present in the holocaust of Haiti. It appeared in the war of 1812, It smouldered in the troubles of the Near East. It came near setting fire to the world in the Boer War and in the incident of Khartum and Fashoda. But on the whole European diplomacy succeeded until 1914 in keeping most European nations from each others' throats in armed rivalry for the proceeds of investment ~~of power~~ in Africa and Asia. Then it failed and the world fell.

As Alvin Johnson says in the Encyclopaedia of the Social Sciences "In the second half of the nineteenth century the development of high capitalism with its dependence on foreign supplies of raw materials and on foreign markets gave new value, in the eyes of statesmen, to colonial dominion. Colonies could be handled as closed trading areas, if necessary. Hence a new imperialism, which resulted in the swift partition of Africa, the extension of British and French dominion in the Indo-Chinese peninsula, extensive schemes for the partition of China and a disposition on the part of the stronger powers to wrest colonial dominions from the weaker ones. Among the results of this imperialistic movement were the Sino-Japanese War, the Boer War and the Spanish American War. The Fashoda incident came near involving France and England in war, as the Morocco dispute came near involving Germany in war with England and France."

Today as we try in anticipation to rebuild the world, the propositions of Dumbarton Oaks concenter their efforts upon stopping war by force and at the same time leaving untouched, save by conquest of colonial territory or strife within colonies promoted by their condition or rivalry over the ownership and control of colonies:*

Nationalistic motives are here mingled with efforts at colonial imperialism. The motive of investment for private profit was preceded by vast treasure hunts, slave trading and labor kidnapping; suppression of labor revolt in colonies among slaves and indented servants; pressure for markets; clearing of territory of groups hostile to agriculture and trade - all these incentives to war culminating in the first World War.

The first World War had among its causes some nationalistic urges, but they alone were not potent enough to set the world a-flame. This needs the culminating rivaling of great world states, determined to settle once for all the domination over the world's colonial wealth and power. England and France had by pact and understanding, divided the best of Africa, including mortgages on Portugese and Belgian colonies. Their colonial and commercial strength in Asia was likely to grow. Germany was convinced that her possessions in Africa were far tpo restricted in view of her growing technique in manufacture and expanding capital and commerce. Japan deeply resentful of her failure to keep close alliance with England and full partnership with Europe in Asia already planned supremacy over the yellow race and mastery of Asia.

This war, terrible as it was left the colonial question with only token settlement. Its termination sought disarmament among rivals for world power; it sought to cripple one rival permanently and put on Germany full blame for making war. It stripped Germany of colonies and with pretense of handing these and eventually all colonies over to international control, established a Mandates commission without power.

Thus there remained almost untouched, the same temptations to war as existed in 1914. Feeling herself cheated in this settlement because the implicit promises of the Treaty of London, were not fulfilled, Italy, first in the Balkans and then in Africa reopened the war, which after futile negotiation and appeasement became the Second World War in 1939.

When we come finally to the consideration of the present World War, we must remember that one of its causes was our failure to implement the magnificent promise of the Mandates Commission; we failed to come to grip with the colonial problem and the Second World War found the colonial question really unsettled and was precipitated by the determination of Italy to enter upon an imperial career in Africa.

In like manner Japan, still smarting under European race prejudice and open contempt hastened war by attacking and dismembering China as a beginning of her determination to supplant Europe and America as colonial exploiter of Asia

Thus in the second World War there arose not simply the rivalry of European powers for imperial domination but above and beyond this looms the shadow of world conflict based on race and color, on the new determination of Japan to exploit Asia for herself since Europe and America had excluded her from partnership. A new Asiatic dream of imperialism has arisen and also a new determination on the part of Europe never to surrender without worldwide struggle the advantages of investment in Asiatic cheap labor, in abundant Asiatic raw materials and in the prestige of world-wide technical leadership based on these advantages. The long fight between Japan and China acquiesced in and even encouraged by Europe for a half century, now suddenly ~~took~~ takes on new complexion and new meaning, when Japan's aim is clear - Pacific

Thus it is ~~clear~~ evident that

Imperialism is a two-fold cause of war: it encourages war within the colonies themselves and between the powers which possess them. Within colonies, absolute conquest being costly if not impossible, the empire following age old wisdom, divides to conquer.

If there are several races, cultures and religious faiths in the colony, the ~~power~~ empire incites the people of one race against the ~~people of~~ another; those of one religion against those of another; for example, the Moslems against the Hindus in India; Arabs and Jews against each other in Palestine; and even - in Uganda - the Catholic Christian converts against the Protestant Christian converts. If there were already struggles between divided groups in the territory conquered, the ~~power, which wishes to possess,~~ empire increases the tendency to struggle; ~~if there were divisions, the possessing~~ ~~power~~ and incites the differing groups to violence; and if there were no divisions the colonial power deliberately creates them, for example, the divisions between the Arabs of Syria, Iraq, Palestine and Trans-Jordania.

This does not mean that Great Britain or France or Japan as Army as the result might desire Race after European conflict.

officially or openly in all cases plan such maneuvres. It does mean that the commercial and investment agencies behind imperial government openly demand development for profits; their local agents themselves know ~~this~~ their real aims and these agents are not always who or usually the highest type of civilized man are in power or in control of those who are. If in the end the colony is kept at work, made to pay interest, turns out materials at low cost, ~~no one~~ few persons at home are going to ask how this was accomplished and the men who bring this to pass no matter at what cost or by what disreputable means stand to receive wealth and honor. Under this veil, cheating, lying, murder and rape; force, deception, bribery and destruction become methods of achieving imperial power, with few questions asked at home.

But the forces and peoples at home do not and cannot escape the moral polution of such methods in dark Africa, heathen Asia and the forgotten South Seas.

Colonialism divides and confuses many groups of ardent social reformers. Because of colonialism, socialists have long been unable to be true to their principles. The questions of Egypt and India, Kenya and Palestine made it impossible for Ramsey MacDonald, Lord Olivier, Wedgewood Benn and Sydney Webb to follow out their socialist principles. Pacifists have been frustrated because of their sympathy with imperial aims. At the time when the peace movement was at its zenith and when every effort was being made to keep Europe from fighting Europeans, pacifists were willing to ignore the fact that the peace of Europe was only maintained by a series of colonial wars which lasted almost continuously from the last half of the nineteenth century to the present, and subdued most of the peoples of the world to partial or complete subserviency to imperial powers.

I remember once attending at the Hotel Astor a meeting of a pacifist organization presided over by Andrew Carnegie. In the midst of a debate on world peace, the then current strife in the Balkans was mentioned. Mr. Carnegie brushed it aside. He said we were talking about peace among the great nations and not about the hordes of the Balkans. Many of those who call themselves pacifists and who are also citizens of countries possessing colonies, resent criticism of governments and resent criticism of the "protection" by their governments of investments in these semi-colonies, and ~~were~~ are irritated at any suggestion that these colonies or concessions should be surrendered.

In the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom at a meeting in 1931, called especially to discuss the colonial question, the British delegates ruled out all discussion on India because it was a "dependency" and not a colony!

A British Pacifist Quaker wrote to "Peace News" that the Japanese had been guilty of seizure in China, but that the concessions in Shanghai and other Chinese ports had not been seized, but bought and were free to all peoples.

As Anna Graves writes

Because of the system of colonialism the workers of the world do not see that as long as there is one people held in subjection there is not one worker in the world who is really free. Because of low paid labour in the jute mills started in India the jute mills in Scotland cannot compete; an old established industry has been ruined and the workers thrown out of employment. "It is the system of colonialism which is responsible for the blindness of the workers in the possessing countries. The sentiment of pride in possessing others is so instilled into them by the Government through propaganda in the schools and the press, that they think of "these others" as quite "different" from themselves - as not worthy of the rights and the well-being they are struggling to gain for themselves; and even if hardly more than slaves themselves are proud of owning others. The Labour Party in England before the first World War voted for appalling expenditure on armaments, an expenditure which they knew very well would prevent sufficient expenditure on housing, on education, on health, etc., and the majority even voted for this extraordinary expenditure avowedly because they were afraid of losing India."

No matter how thoroughly and widely we may in the present war conquer Germany and Japan, we still have the welfare of over one hundred million people in these countries to face and to satisfy with a program adapted to the best interests of Germans and Japanese as well as other normal human beings. Any refusal to face this problem; to evade the problem of colonies; to forget injustice to minorities; to deny the rising struggle between economic classes; and above all to deal frankly and openly with the question of private profit and government control in industry, is to make impossible a solution of the problem of world peace.

When the Labor Party came to partial power under MacDonald, ~~they~~ it did less for the colonies than the Conservatives. They may be excused in part because they never commanded a majority in the House of Commons. Today they demand freedom for India but their ministers in government stand by Churchill

But imperialism does not stop there, it not only promotes civil war, strife and jealousy within the colony, but it is as we have seen a main cause of struggles between powers to possess colonies. Thus colonialism separates peoples and workers and is perhaps the greatest proof of Tolstoy's dictum "I say that there is a absolute good and absolute bad for all that unites humanity is good and beautiful and all that separate humanity is absolutely bad and ugly." ~~It cannot ugliness is shown in this World War~~

Stephen Crane who knew imperialist wars cried

"Is this God?
Where, then, is hell?
Show me some bastard mushroom
Sprung from a pollution of blood.
It is better."

(Stephen "War is Kind")

It does not, therefore, seem possible or even probable that a union of nations to keep the world's peace is going to succeed so long as these nations are divided in interest over the control and possession of colonies. If colonial imperialism has caused war for a century and a half it can be depended upon to remain as a continual cause of other wars in the century to come.

In such a world Schiller's beautiful hymn to joy will fall on ears even more deaf thatn Beethoven.

"There rests upon the independent nations a responsibility in relation to dependent peoples who aspire to liberty. It should be the duty of nations having political ties with such peoples, of mandatories, of trustess, or of other agencies, as the case may be, to help the aspiring peoples to develop materially and educationally, to prepare themselves for the duties and responsibilities of self-government, and to attain liberty. An excellent example of what can be achieved is afforded in the record of our relationship with the Philippines."

Advocacy of the principle of trusteeship for all colonial peoples was proposed by Prime Minister Peter Fraser as one result of the Australia-New Zealand conversations. ...

Recalling the enunciation of principles in the Canberra agreement of last February, Mr. Fraser said the Antipodean dominions felt that as part of a general international organization there should be an international body analogous to the Mandates Commission, but having powers of inspection and publishing reports of its findings.

The following selection has been made from the list of wars printed in Devere Allen's Fight for Peace. The letters following each war stand for these distinctions. The extraordinary profits rolled up by department stores, meat-packing companies and the American Tobacco Company does not mean necessarily the addition of actual wealth to the nation. It means the increased legal rights of certain persons to take from the current income of the nation after the war large percentages of consumable goods and services which cannot consequently be distributed among laborers or go to the common funds of the nation, states and cities unless the tax on such profits is increased rather than lowered according to present demands.

Galley 29

The conference at Bretton Woods was called to explore the economic reorganization of the world after this war. It gave its chief attention to the stabilization of currencies and loans for reconstruction but it gave no attention at all to colonies and investments in colonial cheap labor and raw materials. Yet here, more than elsewhere, lurks the main causes of modern war.

Galley 35

The church universal viewed Rasputin and his ilk with grave and detached tolerance. But when the Bolsheviki cleansed the cesspool of superstition and greed which underlay Christianity in Russia and gave the Russian people, for the first time in history, real religious freedom: the right to be atheists, free-thinkers, Methodists or Catholics - then the church in Western Europe and America shrieked itself black in the face against "godless Russia" and Lenin, "the Anti-Christ".

The Foreign Missions Conference of North America declares that in Africa it is estimated today that eighty-five per cent of the educational load is carried by Christian missions while the government controlled by invested capital furnishes less than fifteen per cent.

Not only has Winston Churchill definitely refused to consider the matter of international control of colonies but the liberal British Secretary of State for Colonies, Oliver Stanley, apparently is ready to surrender international control of mandated territories and has consequently incurred the protest of several eminent leaders including John W. Davis, Emory Ross, James T. Shotwell, Summer Welles and Quincy Wright. They said in the New York Times February 18, 1945:

> "Trusteeship" represented the first and a reasonably successful attempt to put into practice the principle that "the well-being and development of such (dependent) peoples form a sacred trust of civilization". Under the mandates system, national and international machinery was set up to carry out this trust. International colonial experts, for instance, reviewed and criticized the conditions which brought on the rebellion against the French in Syria in 1925, raised serious questions as to Japanese fortifications in the Pacific islands as far back as 1932, and dealt with many hundreds of other matters involving native welfare and the open door for all nations in the development of these territories.
> The abandonment of the gains which were inherent in this system might imply a step toward the division of the world into several great power zones of exclusive domination. It would weaken the system of international responsibility for dependent peoples which was actually practiced between the wars. The continuance and development of this principle and its extension to other dependent territories, especially those to be taken from the enemies at the end of this war, would imply just that much more confidence on the part of the United Nations in the success of their new venture.

A statement by W. E. B. Du Bois, author of Color and Democracy: Colonies and Peace; supplementary to that book, June 5, 1945

I am just returned from the Conference at San Francisco where I acted as Associate to the Delegation of the United States.

The actions at San Francisco were supplementary to Dumbarton Oaks and therefore a word is due concerning any modifications which these actions make in my thesis. That thesis was that the Dumbarton Oaks proposals disfranchised 750,000,000 people living in colonies, making no provision for their representation in the new world order; and that the colonial system is and has been a recurring cause of war and disturbance in the world.

The San Francisco charter of world organization is not yet in its final form; but its main proposals are fairly clear. The California conference took no action concerning colonies. It declared that the international organization cannot interfere with "domestic matters" such as colonies unless by unanimous vote the Security Council determines that a particular case is immediate threat of war,

This means that the organization will be silent concerning India and Nigeria, South Africa and Indonesia. It means also that the broad generalization as to human rights "without discrimination on account of race, creed or language" will not apply to colonial peoples unless England, Belgium, Holland and other colonial powers determine to apply it.

Further than that, the mandated colonies, in Africa, Asia and the Pacific which once belonged to Germany, need not be restored to mandates but may be annexed to the mandatories. If they are put under trusteeship, this can be done only by consent of the mandatories.

They will be ruled without participation of the native peoples. In these mandates less than 20,000,000 live.

There is another set of territories, little empty islands, strewn in the Pacific which can form a chain of fortified forts based on Australia and swinging up to Japan, which can be turned into bastions to dominate control and hold in perpetual ownership the peoples of Asia. Over these there has been deep controversy. The main thought has been of war and exploitation. The people in these areas number less than two million. They and the people of the mandates are as nothing compared with the more than seven hundred millions of colonial peoples whose status was not touched. Yet the most elaborate discussion and argument has been expended upon these islands. These may be mandated under trusteeship and they may not. What the United States wants is to turn them into fortresses for the navy. To this demand Britain is silent because if the United States has her way Britain without question will hold Hong Kong, Singapore and Borneo, not to mention Australia. The United States in ideology belongs with Russia and China, forming the three great powers of the future world whose lives and prosperity need not depend upon the exploitation of colonies, upon using ignorant serf labor in order to build an impressive structure of culture. But what is happening is that the United States is siding with fascist elements in South America, with Great Britain, that must have colonies or die, with France that thinks she must. Not only that but every effort conscious or unconscious, is being made to estrange the United States and Russia, and to make a pattern of future war between the two greatest countries in present power on earth. In San Francisco every little incident that could be has been magnified in the case of Russia. Why? The powers in the background are not hidden. We have in the United States a vast accumulation of power over wealth, production and distribution, put into the hands of organized industry through the vast profits of war. This capital wants investment. It is going to seek investment in Asia and Africa and will not be balked of its prey by any revolutionary idealism in Russia. It will willingly fight or compel others to fight a third and fatal world war to carry out its plans. Every real decision therefore looking toward peace, and especially looking toward the development of the backward peoples and lower classes; the disfranchised colonies, the masses of the Balkans and South America - any step looking forward to a rise in economic or political power, was silently fought at San Francisco. Vague promises were made concerning human rights and the development of peoples toward self-government and social uplift, but promises only without implementation. The actual decisions permit increase of colonial empire, perpetuation of poverty and organization of military power against Asia. This result is because those at present in power in the British Empire are determined to preserve its organization substantially as it exists despite any cost to the world or its people; because other colonial powers are following Britain's lead, they and Americans forget the laborers and real thinkers in Britain, France, Holland, Belgium who oppose the colonial system.

Finally, colonialism was untouched because of the indifference of the mass of people of the United States to the fate of the darker peoples within or without the United States and their utter inability to conceive that anything that can happen to Africans or Asiastics can be of any immediate and pressing concern to the white people of North America.

singularly weak. Stettinius was a good lieutenant to a Franklin Roosevelt. He is too inexperienced and without the necessary knowledge to pit himself against Halifax. Stassen has brains but he does not know the world and his ambitions are toward the present and not the future. The rest of the delegation is of no weight whatever.

While this is the main result at San Francisco, there are some matters that give hope for the future: the Assembly, while without power need not be without influence on world opinion and eventually on world action. The majority of nations to be represented in the Assembly are not in favor of the colonial system and believe in fundamental human rights without discrimination. They are at present powerless to act against the colonial powers; but they have a chance to increase their power.

It was a great accomplishment to have a world meeting which did not end in chaos; which established a world organization with a police force which can act against aggression at least in flagrant cases and which was able to at least express a belief in human rights as an ideal even if they acknowledged themselves helpless to act at present.

A statement by W. E. B. Du Bois, author of Color and Democracy: Colonies and Peace; supplementary to that book, June 5, 1945

I am just returned from the Conference at San Francisco where I acted as Associate to the Delegation of the United States.

The actions at San Francisco were supplementary to Dumbarton Oaks and therefore a word is due concerning any modifications which these actions ~~which these actions~~ make in my thesis. That thesis was that the Dumbarton Oaks proposals disfranchised 750,000,000 people living in colonies, making no provision for their representation in the new world order; and that the colonial system is and has been a recurring cause of war and disturbance in the world.

The San Francisco charter of world organization is not yet in its final form; but its main proposals are fairly clear. The California conference took no action concerning colonies. It declared that the international organization cannot interfere with "domestic matters" such as colonies unless by unanimous vote the Security Council determines that a particular case is immediate threat of war.

This means that the organization will be silent concerning India and Nigeria, South Africa and Indonesia. It means also that the broad generalization as to Human rights "without discrimination on account of race, creed or language" will not apply to colonial peoples unless England, Belgium, Holland and other colonial powers determine to apply it.

Further than that, the mandated colonies, in Africa, Asia and the Pacific which once belonged to Germany, need not be restored to mandates but may be annexed to the mandatories. If they are put under trusteeship, this can be done only by consent of the mandatories. They will be ruled without participation of the native peoples. In these mandates less than 20,000,000 live.

There is another set of territories, little empty islands, strewn in the Pacific which can form a chain of fortified forts based on Australia and swinging up to Japan, which can be turned into bastions to dominate control and hold in perpetual ownership the peoples of Asia. Over these there has been deep controversy. The main thought has been of war and exploitation. The people in these areas number less than two million. They and the people of the mandates are as nothing compared with the more than seven hundred millions of colonial peoples whose status was not touched. Yet the most elaborate discussion and argument has been expended upon these islands. These may be mandated under trusteeship and they may not. What ~~America~~ wants is to turn them into fortresses for the navy. To this demand Britain is silent because if America has her way Britain without question will hold Hong Kong, Singapore and Borneo, not to mention Australia. The United States in ideology belongs with Russia and China, forming the three great powers of the future world whose lives and prosperity need not depend upon the exploitation of colonies, upon using ignorant serf labor in order to build an impressive structure of culture. But what is happening is that the United States is siding with fascist elements in South America, with Great Britain, that must have colonies or die, with France that thinks she must. Not only that but every effort, conscious or unconscious, is being made to estrange the United States and Russia, and to make a pattern of future war between the two greatest countries in present power on on earth. In San Francisco every little incident that could be has been magnified in the case of Russia. Why? The powers in the background are not hidden. We have in the United States a vast accumulation of power over wealth, production and distribution, put into the hands of organized industry through the vast profits of war. That capital wants investment. It is going to seek investment in Asia and Africa and will not be balked of its prey by any revolutionary idealism in Russia. It will willingly fight or compel others to fight a third and fatal world war to carry out its plans. Every real decision therefore looking toward peace, and especially looking toward the development of the backward peoples and lower classes; the disfranchized colonies, the masses of the Balkans and South America - any step looking forward to a rise in economic or political power, was silently fought at San Francisco. Vague promises were made concerning human rights and the development of peoples toward self-government and social uplift, but promises only without implementation. The actual decisions permit increase of colonial empire, perpetuation of poverty and organization of military power against Asia. This result is because those at present in power in the British Empire are determined to preserve its organization substantially as it exists despite any cost to the world or its people; because other colonial powers are following Britain's lead, they and Americans forget the laborers and real thinkers in Britain, France, Holland, Belgium who oppose the colonial system.

Finally, colonialism was untouched because of the indifference of the mass of people of the United States to the fate of the darker peoples within or without the United States and their utter inability to conceive that anything that can happen to Africans or Asiastics can be of any immediate and pressing concern to the white people of North America.

The leadership of the United States in San Francisco is singularly weak. Stettinius was a good lieutenant to a Franklin Roosevelt. He is too inexperienced and without the necessary knowledge to pit himself against Halifax. Stassen has brains but he does not know the world and his ambitions are toward the present and not the future. The rest of the delegation is of no weight whatever.

While this is the main result at San Francisco, there are some matters that give hope for the future: the Assembly, while without power need not be without influence on world opinion and eventually on world action. The majority of nations to be represented in the Assembly are not in favor of the colonial system and believe in fundamental human rights without discrimination. They are at present powerless to act against the colonial powers; but they have a chance to increase their power.

THE COTTON SLAVE
by W.E.B. DU BOIS

Near the close of the 18th century a Connecticut Yankee, ELI WHITNEY, invented the cotton gin, a simple gadget which easily separated the seed from the fibre in the cotton boll. This helped revolutionize the modern world. Cotton, which grew copiously in the southern United States, now became a cheap article of clothing in wide demand and replacing the more expensive flax and wool. From the middle of the 18th century to 1830, a series of further inventions like the steam engine, the spinning jenny and the power loom, made spinning and weaving easier and capable of being carried on in centers where labor and power could be concentrated.

This new demand for cotton was shown in England which had become world mistress of trade by sea and imported only 13,000 pounds in 1781, but half a million pounds in 1820, 800,000 in 1830 and over three million in 1860. To meet this demand and that of France and the Northern United States land and labor was needed in the suitable parts of the South. From the earliest settlement of America labor had been furnished by white serfs from Europe, Indians, and imported blacks from Africa. The white serfs gradually became free citizens; the Indians were comparatively few in number and decimated in wars. A systematic African slave trade, organized by the Dutch and English, transported about 25,000 Negroes a year from 1698 to 1707. When England by war wrested the monopoly of this trade from Spain and drove the Dutch off the seas, she brought 30,000 to 100,000 Negroes a year to the Americas before the Revolution.

In the confines of what is now the United States there were in 1754 nearly 300,000 Negroes, and at the opening of the 19th century about 700,000. These workers held at first the same legal position as white serfs and were used as servants and laborers north and south. Crops like tobacco, sugar and rice were adapted to gang labor in the South, while in the North skilled individual labor in fishing, trade and industry was demanded. Gradually most Negroes became slaves on the Southern plantations.

When the cotton gin and demand for cotton made cotton the chief money crop of the South and the plantation Negro its chief producer, the cotton plantation displaced the patriarchal estate and the slave population grew in the South and dwindled in the North. The slave and free Negro population, North and South, grew as follows: The slaves increased from 900,000 in 1800 to 1,500,000 in 1820; 2 million in 1830; 2½ million in 1840; three million in 1850; and 4 million in 1860. There were 100,000 free Negroes in 1800; 300,000 in 1830; and ½ million in 1860.

The Southern slaves lived on plantations or city estates. Before 1800 they were servants and laborers raising food for the family and tobacco as a money crop. Then by 1820 they were used to raise cotton as the source of wealth. Most of them, men, women and children sowed, attended and picked cotton. They were also the main body of artisans -- builders, iron workers, repair men and a considerable part of the skilled labor. They were ~~xixx~~ nurses and administered herbs and medicines. They were ~~xixxx~~ in smaller numbers, preachers and even teachers; a few became artists and scientists.

Their treatment varied from patriarchal house service to whip-driven field labor. Often from the first they revolted. There were hundreds of attempts but few were very successful; of these were the revolts of GABRIEL in Virginia, VESEY in South Carolina, and NAT TURNER in Virginia. The organization of the masters and the opportunities to escape slavery by running away kept forceful revolt at a minimum. Early the slaves ran away to the swamps of Virginia and Florida. In Florida they combined with the Indians, which led to the Seminole wars. Northward along the mountains and rivers they organized the Underground Railroad with leaders like Harriet Tubman, and helped by Northern abolitionists, went north by thousands. This capital loss was back of the demand for a stringent Fugitive Slave Law.

For this labor to raise cotton, there was needed continuous supplies of rich land. This was obtained by seizing land from Spain and the Indians in Florida; from the Indians in Georgia, Alabama and Mississippi; by purchase from France in 1803 which slave revolt under Toussaint in Haiti made possible; and by conquest from Mexico in 1848. Repeated attempts were made to spread the plantation system in Central America and the West Indies. (Ostend Manifest). In this way the American cotton crop increased from a half million bales in 1822 to a million in 1831, 1½ million in 1838, 2 million in 1842, 3 million in 1852, and the astonishing total of 5 million in 1860.

This system of cotton culture by Negro slaves in the United States became part cause of the Industrial Revolution in Europe. Conquest and theft in India and China furnished capital for Europe to invest in making goods for world trade. The African trade in materials and human beings long dominated this trade and built up the Sugar Empire under the French in the West Indies and the Cotton Kingdom later in the United States.

The system of industry in the Cotton Kingdom was that of planters owning both land and labor. These planters were of all kinds: the older generation were gentlemen of breeding who lived lives of leisure and indulgence surrounded by servants for every wish. From the first the sex morals of the men were easy. In West Indian slavery there were few white women and nearly all white masters had Negro concubines whose children usually became free Negroes. In the continental colonies this colored concubinage continued in lesser degree so that the population of mixed bloods ranged from 11% to 15%, even according to the very inaccurate census reports and not counting Negro blood in the white population.

As slavery changed from a patriarchial estate system to a profit-making business, the type of master changed. "Absolute power corrupts absolutely," and on these independent plantations where the word of one man was law petty tyranny and cruel driving of slaves arose and spread so that the old Southern Gentleman was gradually replaced by the Simon Legree of fiction or the gross and vulgar Bob Toombs of history.

The treatment of the slaves was not on the whole so bad as to stop natural increase. But natural increase included an increasing domestic slave trade from Virginia and the Border States, a deliberate forcing of births there; and much illegal slave importations elsewhere; part of this by actual illicit trade and part by Negroes in annexed territory like Florida, Louisiana and Texas. That the slave labor system was not satisfactory was shown by repeated slave revolts and fierce repressive legislation.

The capitalist system encouraged invention and technique and wide search for markets. American Negroes themselves developed with this world growth. The Negro PAUL CUFFEE went into commerce; BANNEKER became an astronomer and helped lay out the capital at Washington; ALLEN and CAREY built Negro church organizations and burial societies; Negro masonic lodges appeared; actors like ALDRIDGE played in America and Europe.

Southern planters and investors moved south and west into new cotton land. The price of cotton rose and more labor could be used profitably. Black labor began to be transferred from Virginia and the Middle States to the cotton belt. A demand gradually arose for a renewed slave trade from the West Indies and Africa. But the North opposed this because being rid of slavery there, they wanted to see it disappear entirely from a new nation which was to become a free democracy. It was agreed to prohibit the slave trade and then slavery itself would gradually disappear from death or absorption. The cotton planters resisted because in France and Britain cotton spinning increased and more cotton was wanted. Also, the technique of spinning and weaving; the use of goods to make more goods increased, and the new Capitalism began to transform the world.

Already earlier in the 18th century the Sugar crop had enriched France by slave labor in Santo Domingo, but this led to disaster in a series of labor revolts which developed into revolution in Europe and to slave insurrection in America. This made it possible for the opponents of slavery to attempt to stop the slave trade to the United States in 1808. Also, Britain withdrew capital from slavery in the West Indies and joined in suppression of the African slave trade so as to prevent South America from expanding the slave system of labor. The slave trade to the United States was lessened but not really stopped until 1820. By that time the culture of cotton had become what men called a Cotton Kingdom, which supported a vast world of industry and commerce.

Finally, the energy which had gone into revolt and running away began to appear in the Abolition Movement, started by white philanthropy and sparked and aided by free Negroes from the South. A new Negro literature appeared and the fight for freedom at last became armed participation in the war against slavery, which began as an effort to preserve the union on the part of the North and a determination on the part of the South to erect an independent nation based on Negro slavery. Unless, however, the slave population remained as docile workers, this effort was doomed. The slaves left the plantations in increasing numbers, joined the North as laborers, spies and soldiers and thus compelled the South to give up and the North to abolish slavery.

NOTES

1. I suggest the dates 1800 to 1860. No other dates would furnish so complete a cycle of events.

2. This main outline could be expanded to 50 to 100 pages of text.

3. Personal and dramatic interest could be inserted in proper place. I have capitalised some names which could be used for such purposes. Incidents like this could be used:

> "In 1841 a boat was taking 134 slaves from Virginia to Louisiana. The slaves overpowered the crew and took the boat to Nassau in the Bahamas. Daniel Webster, secretary of State, angrily demanded the return of the slaves. Britain refused but in 1853 paid the United States $100,000 for this flesh and blood, and the slaves went free."

Or: "The slave who saved St. Michaels" and was freed.

In this way additional narrative amounting to 100 to 200 more pages might be furnished.

4. A bibliography of five to twenty pages might be added, not of the conventional kind, but dividing the writers into schools, and naming a few leaders in each: "The Romantic Distortion," the "Ethical Damnation," the "Biological Lie," the "Economic Interpretation," the "Blackout of Negroes and Slavery," "The Simple Truth."

THE SLAVE AND COTTON

I800 - I960

JUST at the end of the I8th century Eli Whitney invented the cotton -gin
It was a simple gadget which separated the seed from the lint in the cotton boll.
It revolutionized the world. Cotton a cheap vegetable which grew copiously in the southern South but was used sparingly hitherto, now became a widely demanded staple of clothing, capable of replacing wool and flax as clothing for man knd. It could be spun into thread and woven into cloth easily because of inventions which its abundance encouraged: the steam engine, the spinning jenny, the power loom, 1738-1830

All that was needed was rich land for cultivation and this was ready in the Carolinas, Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, Louisiana and Arkansas, which was free fr for the taking. But demand and land were not enough without labor. The cotton must be sowed, chopped, (i.e rid of weeds) hoed and picked and then ginned
This toil did not demand much skill but it must be applied steadily and at times for long hours.

45-9-22

For this work there was at hand a labor force. Since the end of the Fifteenth century, black folk had been imported from Africa to America as servants and laborers. Indians and Europeans were too few in number to mine metals and raise crops; moreover the white laborers could appeal to European law to escape slave ry and Indians had tribal organization for defense. But imported Negroes, seized in war and by deceit could be brought over and held in perpetual slavery by force.
They rebelled fiercely forming the Maroons in the West Indies and South America and those brought to the mainland of what became the United States, also tried resistance but were gradually subdued to compulsory labor for life. In Virginia and the early Carolinas ; in the middle colonies and New England, they became servants and farm laborers; and also artisans . Under leadership some of them became free workers and voters. Many voted for the constitution of I787 after fighting in the Revolution Slavery thus gradually disappeared in New England and the Middle States. Also it star ted to decrease in the South where there were more Negroes, because of proximity to

This loss of slaves through the Underground Railroad was carried out by black conductors like Harriet Tubman, until it seriously impaired capital invested in slave labor. Also many slaves escaping north sparked the abolition movement and led to its rapid growth from I83⁶to I860. Slave artisans also did much of the work of the South in building and repair work and the slave population was the sourse of what music and folklore arose in the South.

But every attempt to overthrow slavery met the rising price of cotton and led to attempts at colonial imperialism toward Mexico, Cuba, Central America and Soth America. Finally a doctrine prevailed that the Balck slave could be made the basis of a new Cotton , sugar and fruit empire which would lead the world.

This led to civil war and that war was brought to a close by the refusal of Europe to aud the South, the great wealth of the North and the refusal of the Negr slaves to ~~continue~~ support of the white armies of the South.

In the beginning of the 19th. century , however, the increasing supplies of American cotton quickly replaced all others; e.g. from Brazil, the Guianas, the West Indies, the Levant and India.

45-9-20 Black slaves and free land became the back bone of this edifice. The competition for land made trouble in the west and slave revolt made difficulties in the South. Slaves revolted in Virginia and Soth Carolina and gave rise to harsh codes of law to make slaves afraid to rebel. Slaves began to run away to the Indians of Florida, the swamps of Virginia and then along mountain and river to the north even to can

By 1930 they were 2,325,000 an increase of 31⅓%; 2,873,000 in 1940; in 1950 2,638,000 in 1950 and in 1960, 4441 000 . On account of the bitter animosities left by the Civil War, calm and scientific history of slavery has seldom been written. There has been a tendency to heap upon the Negro slave all the blame for the disasters of this era. One may distinguish something like six school s of historical interpretation of Ame ican history from I800 to I860:

THE ROMANTIC DISTORTION

This is the at empt espacially by white Southern writers to pai paint slavery as an idyllic patriarchal system of toil wherby an inferior rae was civilized. V

"THE SERVANT IN THE HOUSE"

The Lady looked at me severely, I glanced away. I had talked at some length on the disfranchisement of my people in society, politics and industry and had studiously avoided the while her cold green eye. I finished and shook weary hands and she lay in wait. I knew what was coming and braced my soul.

"Do you know where I can get a good colored cook?" she said "

I disclaimed all guilty concupiscence. She came nearer and spiritually shook a finger in my face.

"Why - won't - negroes - work?" She panted. "I have given money for years to Hampton and Tuskegee and yet I can't get decent servants. They won't try. They're lazy. They're unreliable. They're impudent and they leave without notice. They all want to be lawyers and doctors and" - (she spit the word in venom" - Ladies'."

"God forbid" I answered solemnly and then being of gentle birth and unminded to strike a defenceless female of uncertain years, I ran, I ran home and wrote a chapter in my book, and this is it.

I speak as a servant's son for my mother spent five or more years of her life as a menial. My whole family indeed in my day, sat poised on that thin edge between the farmer and the menial. The surrounding Irish had two chances: the factory and the kitchen, and most of them took the factory with all its dirt and noise and low wage. The factory was closed to us. Our little lands were too small to feed most of us. A few clung almost sullenly to the old homes - low down and red things crouching on a wide sad level; but the children stirred restlessly and walked often to town and its wonders. Slowly they dribbled off - a waiter here, a cook there; help for a few weeks in Mrs. Blank's kitchen when she had summer boarders.

Instinctively I hated such work from my birth and loathed it and shrank from it. Why? I could not have said. Had I been born in Carolina instead of Massachusetts, I should hardly have escaped the taint of "service". Its temptations in wage and comfort would soon have answered my scruples, and yet, I am sure I would have fought even in Carolina for I knew in my heart that thither lay Hell.

I mowed lawns on contract; did "chores" that left me my own man; sold papers, and peddled tea - anything to escape the shadow of the awful thing that lurked to grip my soul. Once and once only I felt the sting of its talons. I was twenty(20) and had graduated from Fisk and had a scholarship at Havard; I needed, however, travel money and clothes and a bit to live on until the scholarship was due. Fortson was a fellow student in winter and a waiter in summer at the hotel in Minnesota where he worked, and that I go along as "business manager" to arrange for engagements on the journey back. We were all eager but we knew nothing of table-waiting. "Never mind," said Fortson, you can stand around the dining-room during meals and carry out the big wooden trays of dirty dishes. Thus you can pick up knowledge of waiting and earn good tips and get free board. I listened askance but I went.

I entered that broad and blatant hotel at Lake Minnehaha with a distinct foreboding. The long loft with its clean little cots was reassuring, but the meals! There were no meals. At first, before the guests ate, a dirty table in the kitchen was hastily strewn with uneatable soups. We novices were the only ones who came to eat. And then the dining-room with its savours and sights set our appetites on edge. After a while even the pretence of meals was dropped. I was sure I should starve when Dug, one of us, made a startling discovery: the waiters stole the food and stole the best. We gulped and hesitated. Then we stole too, or at least they stole and I shared and we all fattened, for the dainties were marvellous. But it was nasty business and I hated it.

Our work was easy but insipid. We stood about and watched over dressed people gorge. For the most part we were treated like furniture and were supposed to act the wooden part. I watched the trained waiters even more than the guests. I saw that it paid to cringe. One particularly set me crazy. He was intelligent and deft but one day I caught his face as he served a crowd of men - he was playing the clown, crouching, grinning, assuming a broad dialect when he usually spoke good English - ah! it was a heart-breaking sight, and he made more money than any waiter in the dining-room.

I did not mind work or this kind of work, but it was the dishonesty and deception, the flattery and cajolery, the unnatural assumption that worker and diner had no common humanity. It was uncanny. It was inherently and fundamentally wrong. I stood staring and thinking while the other boys hustled about. Then I noticed One Fat Hog feeding at a heavily gilded trough could not find his waiter. He beckoned me. He may be beckoning yet for aught I know, for something froze within me. I did not look his way again.

I would work my hands off for an honest wage, but tips and bows and "hand-me-outs"? never! Fortson was a pious, honest fellow who regarded "tips" as in the nature of things, being to the manner born; but the hotel that summer in other respects rather astonished even him. He came to us much flurried one night and got us to help him with a memorial to the absentee proprietor telling of wild and gay doings of midnights in the rooms and corridors. We listened wide-eyed and eager and wrote the filth out manfully. The proprietor did not thank Fortson nor did he answer the letter.

When I finally walked out of that hotel and out of menial service forever, I felt as though in a field of flowers, my nose had been held unpleasantly long with the worms and manure at their roots.

"Cursed be Canaan!" cried the Hebrew priests. "A servant of Servants shall he be unto his brethren" With what characteristic complacency did the slave-holders assume that Canaanites were Negroes and their"brethren" white? Arenot Negroes servants? Eigo upon such spiritual myths was the anachronism of american slavery built, and this was the degradation that once made menial servants the aristocrates among colored folk. They secured some decenies of food and clothing and shelter and they could more easily reach the masterès ear; their personal abilities of character became known and bonds grew between slave and master which strengthened from friendship to love, from mutual service to mutual blood.

Naturally out of this the West Indian servant climbed out of slavery into citizenship for few West Indian masters--fewer Spanish or Dutch were callous enough to sell them our children into slavery. Not so with English and Americans: with harshness and indecency,seldom paralelled in the civilized world, white masters, on the mainland,sold their mulatto children, half brothers and sisters and their own wives in all but name, into cribe slavery by the hundreds or thousands. They originated a special branch of slavetrading for this special trade and the white of Virginia and the Carolinas made more money by this business, during the 18th and 19th centuries, than in any other way.

The clang of the door of opportunity thus knelled in the ears of the colored home servant, whirled the whole face of advancement as on some vast pivot. The path of salvation for the emancipation;host of black folk lay no longer through the kitchen door with its hall and the pillured verandah of the front porch and plimered yard beyond, it lay as every Negro soon knew and knows in escape from menial service and escape as quickly and mildly and tumultuously as possible.

See the pouring of this army into other paths of industrial freedom. In 1860, 98% of the Negroes were servants and serfs. In 1880, 30% were servants and 65% serfs. The percentage of servants then rose slightly and fell until 21% were in service in 1910 and doubtless much less than 20% today. This is the measure of our rise and the Negro will not be free until this hateful badge of slavery and mediaevalism has been reduced to less than 10%. Not only are less than a fifth of our workers servants today, but the character of the service has been changed. The million menial workers among us include 300,000 upper servants--skilled men and women of character, like hotel waiters, pullman porters, janitors and cooks, who had they been white, could have called on the great Labor movement to lift their work out of slavery--to standardize their home, to define their duties and to substitute a living regular wage for personal in the shape of tips, old clothes and cold leanings of food. But the labor movement turned their backs on those black men when the white would in their ears "Niggers are servants, Servants are Niggers!" They shut the door of escuse to factory and trade in their faces and fattened down the hatches less the 300,000 should be workers equal in pay and consideration with white men.

But if the upper servants could not escape to modern industrial conditions, how much more did their press down on the bodies and souls of 700,000 washerwomen and household drudges, ignorant, unskilled offal of a millionaire industrial system. Their pay was the lowest and their hours the longest of all workers. The personal degradation of their work is so great that any white man of decency would rather cut his daughter's throat than let her grow up to such a destiny. There is throughout the world and in all races no greater source of prostitution than this grade of menial service and the comparatively fear produced among Negro servants is simply because their inmate decency leads them to choose irregular and temporary sexual retations with men they like rather than sell themselves to strangers like the whites. To loose sexual morals are added that revolt against unjust labor conditions which preses itself in

Indeed here among American Negroes we have exemplified the last and worst refuge of industrial caste. Menial service is an anachronism--the refuse of mediaeval barbarism. Why then does it linger? Why are we silent about it? Why in the minds of so many decent and up seeing folk does the whole Negro Problem resolve itself with the matter of their getting a cook or a maid.

The cause to my mind is two fold. First the ancient high estate of Service-- now pitifully fallen, yet gasping for breath. Secondly the present low estate of the industrial outcasts of the world, peering with blood-shot eyes at the gates of heaven.

The Master spoke no greater word than that which said: "whosoever will be great among you let him be your Servant!" What is greater than Personal Service? Surely no social service, no wholesale helping of masses of men can existwhich does not find its effectiveness and beauty in the personal aid of man to man. It is the purest and holiest of duties. Some mighty glimmer of this in those who make the First gentleman of the Badchucher, the maker of the Robes and the Knights of the Bath, the highest nobility that hedged an King. Nor does it differ today what the mother does for the child, or the daughter for the mother; the personal attentions in the old fashioned home--this is Service! Think of what Friend has meant, not simply in spiritual sympathies, but in physical helpfulness. The shell of what was remains in what should be today. In the state what calls for more of love, sympathy, learning, sacrifice and long suffering than the care of children, the preparation of food, the cleansing and ordering of the home, personal attendance and companionship, the care of the body and its raiment--what greater more intimate Services are there than these?

And yet we are degrading them, and loving them and scoffing at them and spitting upon them by first turning them over to the lowest and least competent and worst training classes in the world and then yelling like spoiled babies if our children are neglected, our biscuits sodden, our homes dirty and our baths unpoured. Let one suggest that the only cure for such deeds is in the uplift of the dover and our rage is even worse and less explicable. We will call them by their first names thus again descending a holy intimacy. We will confine them to back doors; we will insist that their meals be no gracious ceremony nor even a restful sprawl by usually a hasty heckled gulp amid garbage; we exact in natural but a purchased deference and we leave them naked to by our children by our husbands.

I remember a girl, how pretty she was with the crimson flooding the old ivory of her cheek and her gracious plumpness. She had come to the valley during the summer to "do housework" I met and and walked home with her in the thrilling shadows to an old village home I knew well and then as I turned to leave, I learned that she was there alone, in that house for a season with only one young man to represent family. Oh he was doubtless a "gentleman" and all that , but for the first time in my life I saw what a snare the fowler, barted by church and state, was spreading in the feet of the daughters of my people.

Not alone is the mist thus offered to the lowly--severely and Serene suffer. The unit which we [illegible]e

The unit which we seek to make the center of society--the home is deprived of the help of invention and suggestion. It is only slowly and by the allowed effort that some small household has been gained for the vacum cleaner, the washing machine, the power tool and the chemical reagent. In our frantic effort to preserve the last vestiges of slavery and mediaevalism, we not only set our faces against such improvements, but we seek to use education and the power of the State to train the servants that do not naturally appear.

Meantime the wild rush from house service on the part of all who can scramble or run continues. The rules of the Labor Union are designed not simply to raise wages, but to guard against any likeness between artism and servants. There is no essential different in ability and training between a street-car-conductor and a Pullman porter, but between them, union cards lies a whole world.

Yet, we are silent. Menial service is not a "social problem." It is not really dismissed. There is no scientific program for its "reform" There is but one "Escape." Get yourselves and your sons and daughters out of the shadow of this awful thing. Hire servants but never be one. Indeed and surely the ability to hire at least "a maid" is still civilization patent to respectability, while "a man" is the first word of aristocracy.

All this is because we still consciously and unconsciously hold to the " " theory of social organization. We believe largely that at the bottom of orgamned human life there are necessary duties and services which no real human being ought to be compelled to do. e push below this the derelicts and half-men whom we hate and despise and seek to build Democracy above it. On such foundations is reared a Theory of Seclusiveness, a feeling that the world progresses by a process of excluding from the benefits of culture the majority of men so that a gifted minority may blossom. Through the door the modern democratic armies to the place where he is willing to allot two able-bodied men and two pure horses to task of helping one wisened beldam to take the money .

Here the absurdity ends. Here all honest minds turn back and ask: is menial service permanent or necessary? Can wenot transfer cooking from home to scientific laboratory along with the laundry? Cannot machinery in the hands of selfrespecting and well paid do our cleaning, sewing, and decorating? Cannot the training of children become an even greater profession than the attending of the sick? And personal service and companionship be coupled with friendship and love where it belongs and whence it can never be divorced without degradation and pain?

In can we not, black and white, rich and poor look forward to a world of Service without Servants?

VI

ON THE RULING OF MEN

The mere fact that democratic government has spread in the past and is still spreading does not prove that those concerned in its spread always realize the broader foundations of the argument ~~that~~ which supports it. Usually nations are dealing with concrete groups, whose enfranchisement is advocated, and the arguments against the step fall under ~~these~~ the following categories:

The persons in the group are:

(a) Too ignorant to ~~v~~ote intelligently.

(b) ~~The persons are~~ Too inexperienced to be trusted with so great a responsibility.

(c) ~~The persons~~ would misuse the privilege.

(d) ~~They~~ do not want the right to vote.

The obvious assumption behind these objections ~~are~~ is that only the intelligent persons should have the right to vote; that voters should possess some technical knowledge of government; that only those persons should have the franchise who do not misuse it for selfish or other ends; ~~and~~ who need the ballot for their good and are anxious to have it.

No sooner, however, do we express these qualifications than it is manifest that these are not such qualifications as one could reasonably require. They are in reality arguments addressed to the self-interest of present rulers, to show that sharing their prerogative with another group would not disturb or prejudice their present power and perquisites.

While, now, it is manifestly the part of practical political wisdom thus to cajole the present ruler, the weapon used is dangerous and the arguments are only partially valid. The real, underlying participation of human beings in their own government must lie deeper than these phrases and be more carefully framed. If this is done, then the advance of democracy will be made easier and more effective, since we can scrutinize the essential facts and not be distracted by immaterial suggestions.

What is, then, the essential argument for extending the ~~right to vote?~~ franchise? We may possibly reach ~~it~~ and answer by clearing away the misapprehensions that lurk in the arguments mentioned above.

For instance, we say easily: "The ignorant ought not to vote." We mean to say: "There should be in the state no ~~grown person~~ adult of sound mind who is not intelligent enough to vote." These two statements may seem to be essentially the same, but they have vastly different implications. In the one case we cast the ignorant aside. They ought not to vote and the implication is that it is their fault. Their interests, we assume, will be looked after by others, voters and if they are not, we acknowledge no responsibility. On the other hand, ~~if~~ when we stress the responsibility of the state to educate its citizens ~~as prior~~ for to political rights, ~~than~~ the conclusion is that if a state allows its citizens to grow up in ignorance, it ought to suffer from an ignorant ballot; that it is the threat of ignorant voters ~~that~~ which makes good schools.

The second argument, that experience is a necessary prerequisite to voting, is absurd. According to this we should have no new voters, unless we assume that the capacity to rule is hereditary. Such assumptions have been made in the past with regard to certain races and ~~one~~ the female sex. It can scarcely be said, however, that any adequate proof exists which proves that only white persons or Englishmen or only persons of the male sex are capable of learning to take part in democratic government. When we consider that the civilized world today is being ruled by classes who were pronounced utterly incapable of self rule, or of being trained for self rule, a century ago, we must conclude that the ability to rule is, on the whole, a matter of social training and that consequently there must always be a part of the body politic without experience, who must be trained by the others. In voting, as in other matters, we learn by doing. It is to be expected that every new voting class and every new democracy will make its costly and ridiculous mistakes because of inexperience, ~~will pass through demogoguery~~, extravagance, "boss" rule, bribery, and the like; but it is through such experience that voters learn to rule and the cost, although vast, is not excessive if the end is finally gained.

Thus we see that ignorance is a warning and a public responsibility rather than a permanent excuse for disfranchisement, save in the case of the small number who cannot be educated; that inexperience can only be cured by experience and it is, consequently, no reason for disfranchisement; that misuse of the ballot is perhaps the most effective way of teaching its right use.

There are, however, people who insist on regarding the franchise not as a necessity for the many, but as ~~the~~ a privilege for the few. They say of persons and classes: "They do not need the ballot." This is often said of women. It is argued that everything ~~that~~ which women might do for themselves with the ballot can be done for them; that they have influence and friends "at court," and that their disfranchisement would simply double the number of ballots. So, too, we are told that American Negroes can have done for them by others all that they could possibly do for themselves with the ballot and much more because the whites are more intelligent.

Further than this it is argued that many of the disfranchised people recognize ~~this~~ these facts. "Women do not want the ballot," has been a very effective counter war cry, so much so that many ~~a~~ man has taken refuge in the declaration: "When they want to vote," why, then,--So, too, we are continually told that the "best" Negroes stay "out of politics."

Such arguments show so curious a misapprehension of the foundations of the argument for democracy that the argument must be continually restated and emphasized. We must remember that if the theory of democracy is correct, the right to vote is not merely a privilege, not simply a method of meeting the needs of a particular group, and least of all a matter of recognized want or desire. Democracy is a method of realizing the broadest measure of justice to all human beings. The world has, in the past, attempted various methods of attaining this end, most of which can be summed up in three categories:

The method of the benevolent tyrant,
" " " " select few,
" " " excluded groups.

The method of entrusting the government of a people to a strong ruler has great advantages when the ruler combines strength with ability, unselfish devotion to the public good, and knowledge of what that good calls for. Such a combination is, however, rare and the selection of the right ruler is very difficult. To leave the selection to force is to put a premium on physical strength, chance, and intrigue; to make the selection a matter of birth simply transfers the real power from sovereign to minister. Inevitably the choice of rulers must fall on electors.

Then comes the problem, who shall elect? The earlier answer was: Select few such as the wise, the best born, the able. Many people assume that it was corruption which made such aristocracies fail. By no means. The best and most effective aristocracy, like the best monarchy, suffered from lack of knowledge. The rulers did not know or understand the needs of the people and they could not find out, for in the last analysis only the man himself, however humble, knows his own condition. He may not know how to remedy it, he may not realize just what is the matter; but he knows when something hurts and he alone knows how that hurt feels. And if he had ~~Or, if~~, sunken below feeling or comprehension or complaint, and does not even know that he is hurt, God help his country, for it not only lacks knowledge, but has destroyed the sources of knowledge.

So soon as a nation discovers that it holds in the heads and hearts of its individual citizens the vast mine of knowledge out of which it may build an ~~just~~ equitable government, then more and more it calls those citizens to select their rulers and to judge the justice of their acts.

Even here, however, the temptation is to ask only for the wisdom of citizens of a certain grade or those of recognized worth. Continually some classes are tacitly or expressly excluded. Thus women have been ~~regularly~~ excluded from modern democracy because of the persistant theory of female subjection and because it ~~was~~ is argued that their husbands or other male folk ~~would look~~ will see to their interests. Now, manifestly, most husbands, fathers, and brothers, will, so far as they know how, or ~~so far~~ as they realize women's needs, look after them. But remember ~~that~~ the foundation of the argument ~~is~~ that in the last analysis only the sufferer knows his sufferings and that no state can be strong which excludes from its expressed wisdom the knowledge possessed by mothers, wives and daughters. ~~Certainly~~ We have but to view the unsatisfactory relations of ~~the sexes~~ men and women the world over and the problem of children to realize how desperately we need this excluded wisdom.

The same arguments apply to other excluded groups: If a race like the Negro race, is excluded, then so far as that race is a part of the economic and social organization of the land the feeling and the experience of that race ~~is~~ are absolutely necessary to the realization of the broadest justice for all citizens. Or if the "submerged tenth" be excluded, then, again, there is lost from the world an experience of untold value and they ~~submerged~~ must be raised rapidly to a plan where they can speak for themselves.

no ¶ In the same way and for the same reason children must be educated, insanity prevented, and only those put under guardianship of others who can in no way be trained to speak for themselves.

The real argument for democracy is, then, that in the people we have the ~~real~~ source of that endless life and unbounded wisdom which the ~~real~~ rulers of men must have. A given people today may not be intelligent, but through a democratic government, ~~that~~ which recognizes, not only the worth of the individual to himself, but the worth of his feelings and experiences to all, ~~they~~ can educate, not only the individual unit, but generation after generation, until they accumulate vast stores of wisdom. Democracy alone is the method of showing the whole experience of the race for the benefit of the future and if democracy tries to exclude women or Negroes or the poor or any class because of innate characteristics which do not interfere with intelligence, then that democracy cripples itself and belies its name.

From this point of view we can easily see the weakness and strength of current criticism ~~of~~ for extensions of the ballot. It is the business of a modern government to see to it, first, that the number of ~~the~~ ignorant persons within its bounds is reduced to the very ~~small~~ lowest number. Again, it is the duty of every such government to ~~extend~~ increase as quickly as possible the number of ~~grown~~ adult persons ~~of mature age~~ who can vote. Such possible voters must be regarded, not as sharers of a limited treasure, but as sources of new national wisdom and strength.

The addition of the new wisdom, the new points of view and new interests must, of course, be from time to time bewildering and confusing. Today those persons who have a voice in the body politic have expressed their wishes and sufferings. The result has been a smaller or greater balancing ~~and~~ of their conflicting interests. The appearance of new interests and complaints means disarrangement and confusion of the older equilibrium. ~~But this is not in itself evil.~~ It is the inevitable preliminary step to that larger equilibrium in which the interests of no human soul will be neglected. These interest They will not, surely, be all fully realized, but they will be recognized and given as full weight as the conflicting interests ~~of others~~ will allow. The problem of government thereafter ~~will~~ would be to reduce the necessary conflict of human interests to the minimum.

From such a point of view one easily sees the strength of the demand for the ballot on the part of certain disfranchised classes. When women ask for the ballot, they are asking not a privilege, but a necessity. You may not see the necessity, you may easily argue that women do not need to vote. Indeed, the women themselves in considerable number may ~~feel the same~~ agree with you. Nevertheless, ~~they~~ women do need the ballot. They need it to right the balance of a world sadly awry because of its brutal neglect of the rights of women and children. ~~With~~ Notwithstanding the best will and knowledge no man can know women's wants as well as women themselves. To disfranchise ~~them~~ women is deliberately to turn from knowledge and grope in ignorance.

So, too, with American Negroes: The South continually insists that a benevolent guardianship of whites over blacks is the ideal thing. They assume that white people not only know better what Negroes need than Negroes themselves, but are anxious to supply ~~those~~ these needs. As a result ~~instead of knowledge~~, they grope in ignorance and helplessness. They can not "understand" the Negro; they cannot protect him from cheating and lynching; and, in general, instead of loving guardianship, we see anarchy and exploitation. If the Negro could speak for himself in the South instead of being spoken for, if he could defend himself instead of having to depend on the chance sympathy of white citizens, how much healthier a growth of democracy the South would have.

So, too, with the dark races of the world. No federation of the world, no true internation, can exclude the black and brown and yellow races, from its council. They must equally and according to number act and be heard at the world's council.

It is not, for a moment, to be assumed that enfranchising women will not cost something. It will for many years confuse our politics, ~~It will~~ and change the composition of parentage and ~~sound~~ life. It will admit to the ballot thousands of inexperienced persons, unable to vote intelligently. Above all, it will interfere with some of the present prerogatives of men and probably for sometime to come annoy them considerably.

So, too, Negro enfranchisement meant reconstruction, with its theft and bribery and incompetency as well as ~~is~~ public schools and enlightened social legislation. It would mean today that black men in the South would have to be treated with consideration, have their wishes ~~more~~ respected and their manhood rights recognized. Every white Southerner who wants peons beneath him; who believes in hereditary menials and a privileged aristocracy, or who hates certain races because of their characteristics, would resent this.

Notwithstanding this, if America is ever to become a government built on the broadest justice to every citizen, then every citizen must be enfranchised. There may be temporary exclusions, until the ignorant ~~or~~ and their children are taught or to avoid too sudden an influx of inexperienced voters. But such exclusions can be but temporary if justice is to prevail.

The insistent call of democracy is ringing in the ears of all people today as never before, in spite of the hard experiences of the past. The cure for the ills of democracy is seen to be the need for more democracy. We are rapidly changing from a form of social control dictated by the interests of a few to one dictated by the interests of a larger and larger majority. Not only is this true in what is usually called politics, but also it is true in industry. In fact, our political interests are becoming more and more industrial and our industry is assuming larger and larger political aspects. In the industrial world we are still under the rule of the strong monarch, with at most the mitigation of the power of the selected few. We feel the consequent confusion, and ~~We~~ lack knowledge of industrial conditions, ~~We~~ have no standards of industrial justice. Whence shall knowledge and standards come? Through democracy. Through having the rights and wishes of every worker represented in the power ~~that~~ which controls industry. This will be hard to attain. The passing of the strong monarch in industry, as in politics, will spell anarchy in many places, but social justice will eventually come. How necessary, then, to build a state of the broadest democracy to cope with the industrial problem within nations and between nations and races. Why fear the Bolsheviki, so long as their faces are set toward the future?

Turning now from the general to the specific we may note that there are today two great political movements toward democracy: the movement that would break down the political disabilities of women, and the movement ~~that~~ which refuses to recognize mere racial difference as a sufficient reason for political disfranchisement. While these movements are and must be but different phases of the one trend toward the basing of all government on the consent of the governed, they have but infrequently recognized each other, ~~or~~ made common cause, or seemed to realize that both move toward one far off divine event.

This is to a degree, natural. A social reform in order to achieve immediate success must be specific and single-eyed; where a movement toward democracy, as such, might fail, movements toward enfranchising particular groups continually succeed.

no ¶ The danger is, however, that advocates of the specific and particular cause may be tempted, consciously or unconsciously, to belittle or even antagonize other causes, which cry for the same democratic ideal, and thus retard the greater movement, for the sake of the smaller advantage.

This has been peculiarly true of the fight ~~of~~ for enfranchisement across the lines of race and sex. In the democratic upheaval in India one continually heard on the lips of enlightened men contempt for the English suffragettes and for "Votes for Women" anywhere. Here in the United States large numbers of colored workingmen would without hesitation vote against woman's suffrage and the leaders of white workingmen have seldom been enthusiasts in this cause.

On the other hand, I doubt if a woman suffrage rally has been held in the last ten years where first or last someone did not base an argument ~~of~~ argument the desirability of votes for ~~women on the undesirability of votes for~~ women on the undesirability of votes for black folk. At times the argument has even taken a further step and we have been asked to contemplate the absurdity of allowing the black coachmen to vote when the white mistress was denied the franchise. The subtle poison in all such arguments is the covert appeal to class and rade prejudice, to aristocracy as against democracy; the subtle assumptions that the hurt to me lies not in my own disfranchisement so much as in the enfranchisement of some one else ~~whom I do not regard and who should the enfranchisement of some one else~~ whom I do not regard and who should not be regarded by others as my equal, on pain of my vast displeasure.

Manifestly such argument and attitude are dangerous and unworthy of a cause. It goes without saying that no permanent argument for democracy can be based on undemocratic foundations. The by-path to oligarchy and class consciousness cannot be made the high way to universal suffrage.

I should hardly expect, for instance, that the woman's suffrage movement in the United States would attempt specificially to fight for the cause of Negro suffrage or for the greater freedom of the laboring man's vote, but I insist that it fight for all women, rich and poor, black and white, and I am pointing out that every argument for the abolition of sex discrimination in the use of the franchise is an argument against the political slavery of races and the economic slavery of classes and that no objection has ever been raised against the right of black men to vote but what the same argument, with but superficial difference, has been hurled against voting women. One has but to name the arguments of inherent inferiority, of constitutional incapacity, of economic disability, and of the peculiarity of necessary social service, to realize the striking paralellism.

Why, now, has there been this peculiar tendency of the disfranchised to make common cause with the enemy and against each other in these modern days? It is without doubt by reason of the counter-democratic movement, which has characterized the political thought of the early twentieth century, before the ~~Great~~ World War, as contrasted with the philosophy of the early nineteenth century. Many earnest, but perhaps over anxious, thinkers have concluded that the democracy and universal suffrage for which the fathers fought was a mistaken ideal and that the efficiency which we used to demand could not be had through democracy. In no other way can we explain the encouragement of the strong and often ruthless executive, the concentrated power of cabinets and commissions, the triumph of militarism, and a certain wide-spread contempt for popular elections.

Any ~~new~~ movement for enfranchisement had to face this new and strong body of opinion. Small wonder that the new movement was tempted to say: We, too, doubt democracy; we, too, are willing to curb the electorate. Look upon us not as advocates of further democratization of the world, but rather as allies of your own kith and kin, who will help you make the world less democratic in order that it may be more efficient for our ends.

The principle of basing all government on the consent of the governed is undenied and undeniable. Moreover, the method of modern democracy has placed within reach of the modern state larger reserves of efficiency, ability, and even genius than the ancient or mediaeval state dreamed of. That this great work of the past can be carried further among all races and nations ~~there~~ no one can ~~be no~~ reasonable doubt.

Great as ~~are~~ our human differences and capabilities there is not the slightest scientific reason for assuming that a given human being of any race or sex cannot reach normal human development if he is granted a reasonable chance. This is, of course, denied. It is denied so volubly and so frequently and with such positive conviction that the majority of unthinking people seem to assume that most human beings are not human and have no right to human treatment or human opportunity. All this goes to prove that human beings are and must be woefully ignorant of each other. It always startles us to find folk thinking as we are thinking. ~~like ourselves.~~ We do not really associate with each other, ~~we associate with our ideas of each other~~ we associate with our ideas of each other and few people have either the ability or courage to question their own ideas. None have more persistently and dogmatically insisted on the inherent inferiority of women than the men with whom they come in closest contact. It is the husbands, brothers and sons of women whom it has been most difficult to induce to consider women seriously or to acknowledge that women have rights which men are bound to respect. So, too, it is those people who live in closest contact with black folk who have most unhesitatingly asserted the utter impossibility of living beside Negroes who were not ~~either~~ industrial or political slaves ~~and~~ or social pariahs. All this proves that none are so blind as those nearest the thing seen while, on the other hand, the history of the world is the history of the discovery of the common humanity of human beings among steadily increasing circles of men.

What reasonable doubt is there that the flood of democracy that has already successfully overflowed the barriers of family, locality, class, nation, and sex, will not just as surely surmount the ramparts of race? It must be so. If, then, the world has no cause to fear the democratic ideal toward which, despite back eddies and whirlpools, it is steadily moving, what is the cause of the undoubted reaction and alarm ~~that~~ which the citizens of democracy continually feel? It is, I am sure, the failure to feel the full significance of the change of rule from a privileged minority to that of an omnipotent majority and the failure to assume that mere majority rule is the last word of government; that majorities have no responsibilities, but rule by the grace of God. Granted that government should be based on the consent of the governed, does the consent of a majority at any particular time adequately express the consent of all? Has the minority, even though a small and unpopular and unfashionable minority, no right to respectful consideration?

I remember that excellent little high school text book,

"Nordhoff's Politics," where I first read of government, saying this sentence at the beginning of its most important chapter: "The first duty of a minority is to become a majority." This is a statement which has its underlying truth, but it also has its dangerous falsehood; viz., any minority which cannot become a majority is not worthy of any consideration. But suppose that the out voted minority is necessarily always a minority? Women, for instance, can seldom expect to be a majority; artists and thinkers must always be the few; and black folk in this land are but a tenth. Yet to tyrannize over such minorities, to browbeat and insult them, to call that government a democracy which makes majority votes an excuse for crushing ideas and individuality and self development, is manifestly a peculiarly dangerous perversion of the real democratic ideal. It is right here, in its method and not in its object, that democracy in America and elsewhere has so often failed. We have attempted to enthrone any chance majority and make it rule by divine right. We have kicked and cursed minorities as upstarts and usurpers when their sole offense lay in not having ideas or ~~hair~~ we like ours. Efficiency, ability, and genius found often no abiding place in such a soil as this. Small wonder that revolt has come and high handed methods are rife, ~~of~~ pretending that policies which we favor or persons ~~that~~ whom we like have the anointment of purely imaginary majority vote.

31-6-13

Are the methods of such a revolt wise, howsoever great the provocation and evil? maybe If the absolute monarchy of majorities is galling and inefficient, is it any more inefficient than the absolute monarchy of individuals or privileged classes have been found it to be in the past? Is the appeal from a numerous minded despot to a smaller, privileged group or to one man likely to remedy matters permanently? Shall we step backward a thousand years because our present problem is baffling?

Surely not and surely, too, the remedy for absolution lies in calling these same minorities to council. As the king-in-council succeeded the king by the grace of God, so in future democracies the toleration and encouragement of minorities and the willingness to consider to the point of "men" the humblest and poorest and blackest, peoples must be the real key to the consent of the governed. Peoples and governments will not in the future assume that because they have the brute power to enforce momentarily dominant ideas, ~~that~~ it is best to do so without thoughtful conference with the ideas of smaller groups and individuals. Proportionate representation in physical and spiritual form must come.

That this method is virtually coming in vogue we can see by the minority groups of modern legislatures. Instead of the artificial attempts to divide all possible ideas and plans between two great parties, modern legislatures in advanced nations tend to develop smaller and smaller minority groups, while government is carried on by temporary coalitions. For a time we inveighed against this and sought to consider it a perversion of the only possible method of practical democracy. Today we are gradually coming to realize that government by temporary coalition of small and diverse groups may easily become the most efficient method of expressing the will of man and of setting the human soul free. The only hindrance to the faster development of this government by allied minorities is the fear of external war which is used again and again to melt these living, human, thinking groups into inhuman thoughtless and murdering machines.

The persons, then, who come forward in the dawn of the twentieth century to help in the ruling of men must come with the firm conviction that no nation, race, or sex, has a monopoly of ability or ideas; that no human group is so small as to deserve to be ignored as a part, and as an integral and respected part, of the mass of men; That, above all, no group of twelve million black folk, even though they are at the physical mercy of a hundred million white majority, can be deprived of a voice in their government and of the right to self development without a blow at the very foundations of all democracy and all human uplift; That the very criticism aimed today at universal suffrage is in reality a demand for power on the part of consciously efficient minorities, but ~~that~~ these minorities face a fatal blunder when they assume that less democracy will give them and their kind greater efficiency. However desperate the temptation, no modern nation can shut the gates of opportunity in the face of its women, its peasants, its laborers, or its socially damned. How astounded the future world citizen will be to know that as late as 1918 great and civilized nations were making desperate endeavor to confine the development of ability and individuality to one sex, that is, to one-half of the nation; and he will probably learn that similar effort to confine humanity to one race lasted a hundred years longer.

The doctrine of the divine right of majorities leads to almost humorous insistence on a dead level of mediocrity. It demands that all people be alike or that they be ostracized. At the same time its greatest accusation against rebels is this same desire to be alike: The suffragette is accused of wanting to be a man, the socialist is accused of ~~any~~ envy for the rich and the black man is accused of wanting to be white.

That any one of these should simply want to be himself is to the average worshipper of the majority inconceivable and yet of all worlds, may the good Lord deliver us from a world where everybody looks like his neighbor and thinks like his neighbor and is like his neighbor.

The world has long since awakened to a realization of the evil which a privileged few may exercise over the majority of a nation. So vividly has this truth been brought home to us that we have lightly assumed that a privileged and enfranchised majority cannot equally harm a nation. Insane, wicked, and wasteful as the tyranny of the few over the many may be, it is not more dangerous than the tyranny of the many over the few. Brutal physical revolution can and usually does end the tyranny of the few. But the spiritual losses from suppressed minorities may be vast and fatal and yet all unknown and unrealized because idea and dream and ability are paralyzed by brute force. 127

If, now, we have a democracy with no excluded groups, with all men and women enfranchised, what is such a democracy to do? How will it function? What will be its field of work?

The paradox ~~that~~ which faces the civilized world today is that democratic control is everywhere limited in its control of human interests. Mankind is engaged in preparing food, clothes and shelter, manufacturing tools and machinery, transporting goods, giving information, advancing science, creating art, educating children, relieving distress, and making laws. Of all these matters, we think of democratic control only in making laws and there but incidentally. To be sure, democracy rules largely in art and science, but only among the few who are permitted within the sanctuary. The law-making function, which is set aside for democratic control, is today of less importance than in the past when the people first demanded power. It is destined in the future to be of even less importance and whatever importance it has today is directly dependent upon the technique of industry, - of earning a living.

In industry, however, democracy has small foothold. There the monarch and the aristocracy rule and there are those, people who call themselves democratic, and ~~who~~ believe firmly that ~~here~~ in work democracy can never enter. Industry, they maintain, is a matter of technical knowledge and ability, and, therefore, ~~are~~ the eternal heritage of the few. They point ~~of~~ to the failure of attempts at democratic control in industry, just as we used to point to Spanish-American governments, and they expose, not simply the failures of Russian Soviets, - they fly to arms to prevent that greatest experiment in industrial democracy which the world has yet seen. These are the ones who say: We must control labor or civilization will fail; We must control yellow labor in Asia and black labor in Africa and the South else we shall have no tea or rubber or cotton. And yet - and yet is it so easy to give up the dream of democracy ~~here~~? Must industry rule men or may men rule even industry? And unless men rule industry, can they ever hope really to make laws or educate children or create beauty?

128 in work

THE CALL

In the land of the Heavy Laden came once a dreary day. And the king, who sat upon ~~the~~ Great, White, Throne, raised ~~up~~ his eyes and saw afar off how the hills around were hot with hostile feet and the sound of the mocking of his enemies struck anxiously on ~~the king's~~ his ears, for the king loved his enemies. So the king lifted ~~up~~ his hand, and in the glittering silence spake softly, saying: "Call the servants of the king." Then the herald stepped before the armpost of the throne and cried: "Thus saith the High and Mighty One, whose name is Holy, - the servants of the King." Now, of the servants of the king there were a hundred and forty-four thousand, - tried men and brave, brawny of arm and quick in wit; aye, too, and women of wisdom and marvelous in beauty and grace. And yet on this drear day when the King called, their ears were thick with the dust of the enemy, their eyes were blinded with the flashing of his spears and they hid their faces in dread silence and moved not, even at the king's behest. So the herald called again. And the servants cowered in very shame, but none came forth. But the third blast of the herald struck upon a woman's heart, afar. And the woman straightway left her baking and sweeping and the rattle of ~~tins,~~ pans ~~And the woman straightway left~~ her chatting and gossiping and the sewing of garments, ~~And the women~~ and stood before the king, saying; "The servant of thy servants, ~~O~~ my Lord."

~~Then~~ The king smiled, - smiled wondrously, so that the setting sun burst through the clouds and the hearts of the king's men dried hard within them. And the low-voiced king said, so low that even they ~~that~~ who listened heard not well: "Go, smite me mine enemies, that they cease to do evil in my sight." And the woman quailed and trembled. Three times she lifted ~~up~~ her eyes unto the hills and saw the heathen whirling onward in their rage. And seeing, she shrank - three times she shrank and crept to the king's feet. "O king," she cried, "I am but a woman," and the king answered: "Go, then, mother of men." And the woman said, "Nay, king, but I am still a maid." Whereat the king cried: "O Maid, ~~made Man~~, thou shalt be bride of God." And yet the third time the woman shrank at the thunder in her ears and whispered: "Dear God, I am black!" ~~And~~ The king spake not, but swept the veiling of his face aside and lifted ~~up~~ the light of his countenance upon ~~her~~ the woman and lo! ~~it~~ she was black.

So the woman went forth ~~on~~ to the hills of God to do battle for the king, on that drear day in the land of the heavy laden, when the heathen raged and imagined a vain thing.

THE DAMNATION OF WOMEN

I remember four women of my boyhood: mother, cousin Inez, Emma, and Ide Fuller. They presented the problem of the widow, the wife, the maiden, and the outcast. They were ~~in color~~, brown and light brown, yellow with brown freckles, and white. They existed, not for themselves, but for men; they were named because of their relations with men, living and ~~not~~ dead.

No ¶ They were not beings, they were relations and their relations were enfilmed with mystery and secrecy. We did not know the truth or believe it when we heard it. Motherhood! What was it? We did not know nor greatly care. ¶ My mother and I were good chums. I liked her. After she was dead I loved her with a fierce sense of love and personal loss.

Inez was a pretty, brown cousin who married. What was marriage? We did not know, neither did she, poor thing! He came to mean for her, a litter of children, poverty, a drunken, cruel companion, sickness, and death. Why? ~~Why?~~

There was no sweeter sight than Emma, slim, straight, and dainty, darkly flushed with the passion of youth; but her life was a wild, awful struggle to crush her natural, fierce joy of love. She crushed it and became a cold, calculating mockery. Last there was that awful Outcast of the town, the white woman, Ide Fuller. What she was, we did not know. She stood to us as embodied filth and wrong--but whose filth, whose wrong?

~~Grown up~~ Now I see the problem of these women transfused; I hear all about me the unanswered call of youthful love, none the less glorious because of its clean, honest, physical passion. Why unanswered? Because the youth are too poor to marry or if they marry, too poor to have children. They turn aside, then, in three directions: to marry for support, to what men call shame, or to that which is more evil than nothing. It is an unendurable paradox, it must be changed or the bases of culture will totter and fall.

The world wants healthy babies and intelligent workers. Today we refuse to allow the combination ~~and~~ by forcing thousands of intelligent workers to go childless at a horrible expenditure of moral force or we damn them if they break our idiotic conventions. Only at the sacrifice of her intelligence and her chance to do her best work can the majority of modern women bear children. This is the damnation of women.

All womanhood is hampered today because of the world in which it is ~~emergency~~ emerging is a world that tries to worship both virgins and mothers and in the end despises motherhood and despoils virgins.

The future woman must have a life work and economic independence. She must have knowledge. She must have the right of motherhood at her own discretion. The present mincing horror at free womanhood must pass if we are ever to be rid of the bestiality of free manhood; not by guarding the weak in weakness do we gain strength, but by making weakness free and strong.

The world must choose the free woman or the white wraith of the prostitute. Today it wavers between prostitute and nun. Civilization must show two things: The glory and beauty of creating life, and the need and duty of power and intelligence. This and this only will make the perfect marriage of love and work.

Love is God,
~~God~~ love
~~Love~~ is ~~God~~;

There is no God but Love
And Work is His Prophet!

All this of woman -------- but what of black woman?

The world ~~that~~ which wills to worship womankind studiously forgets its darker sisters. They seem in a sense to typify that veiled melancholy:

"Whose saintly visage is too bright
To hit the sense of human sight,
And, therefore, to our weaker view
O'er laid with black."

Yet the world must heed these daughters of sorrow from the primal black All Mother of men down through the ghostly throng of mighty womanhood, who walked in the mysterious dawn of Asia and Africa; from ~~neither~~ the primal black mother of all, whose feet rest on hell, and whose almighty hands uphold the heavens; all religion, from beauty to beast, lies on her eager breasts; her body bears the stars, while her shoulders are necklaced by the dragon; from ancient Meith down to "that starr'd Ethiop queen ~~that~~ who strove to set her beauty's praise above the sea nymphs."

no P through dusky Cleopatra, dark Candaces and darker, fiercer Zinghas, to our own day and our own land,-in gentle Phillis, Harriett, the crude Moses, the sybil Sojourner Truth, and the martyr, Louise De Mortie.

The father and his worship is Asia; Europe is the precocious, self-centered, forward-striving child; but the land of the mother is and was Africa! In subtle and mysterious way, despite her curious history, her slavery, polygamy and toil, the spell of the African mother prevades her land. Isis, the mother, is still titular goddess, in thought if not in name, of the dark continent. Nor does this all seem to be solely a survival of the historic matriarchate through which all nations pass--it appears to be more than this; as if the great black race in passing up the steps of human culture gave the world not only the ironage, the cultivation of the soil, and the domestication of animals, but, also, in peculiar emphasis, the mother-idea.

"No mother can love more tenderly and none is more tenderly loved than the Negro mother," writes Schneider. Robin tells of the slave who bought his mother's freedom instead of his own. Mungo Park writes: "Everywhere in Africa, I have noticed that no greater affront can be offered a Negro than insulting his mother. 'Strike me,' cries a Mandingo to his enemy, 'but revile not my mother!'" And the Krus and Fantis say the same. The peoples on the Zambezi and the great lakes cry, in sudden fear or joy: "O, my mother!" And the Herero swears (endless oath) "By my mother's tears!" "As the mist in the swamps," cried the Angola Negro, "so lives the love of father and mother."

A student of the present Gold Coast life describes the work of the village headman and adds: "It is a difficult task that he is set to, but in this matter he has all-powerful helpers in the female members of the family, who will be either the aunts or the sisters or the cousins or the nieces of the headman, and as their interests are identical with his in every particular, the good women spontaneously train up their children to implicit obedience to the headman whose rule in the family thus becomes a simple and an easy matter. 'The hand that rocks the cradle rules the world.' What a power for good in the native state system would the mothers of the Gold Coast and ~~Ashnaii~~ Ashanti become by judicious training upon native lines!"

Schweinfurth declares of one tribe: "A bond between mother and child which lasts for life is the measure of affection shown among the Dyoor," and Ratzel adds:

"Agreeably to the natural relation the mother stands first among the chief influences affecting the children. From the Zulus to the Waganda, we find the mother the most influential counsellor at the court of ferocious sovereigns like Chaka or Mtesa; sometimes sisters take her place. Thus even with chiefs who possess wives by hundreds the bonds of blood are the strongest and that the woman, though often heavily burdened, is in herself held in no small esteem among the Negroes is clear from the numerous Negro queens, from the medicine-women, from the participation in public meetings permitted to women by many Negro peoples."

As I remember through out ~~memories of others, backward through~~ my own family, it is the mother I ever recall; the little, far off mother of my grandmothers, who sobbed her life away in song, longing for her lost palm-trees and scented waters; the tall and bronzen grandmother, with beaked nose and shrewish eyes, who loved and scolded her black and laughing husband as he smoked lazily in his high oak chair; above all, my own mother, with all her soft brownness, - the brown velvet of her skin, the sorrowful black-brown of her eyes, and the tiny brown-capped waves of her midnight hair as it lay new parted on her forehead. All the way back in these dim distances it is mothers and mothers of mothers ~~that~~ who seem to count, ~~and~~ while fathers are shadowy memories.

Upon this African mother-idea, the westward slave trade and American slavery struck like doom. In the cruel exigencies of the traffic in men and in the sudden, unprepared emancipation, the great pendulum of social equilibrium swung from a time, in 1800, when America had but eight or less black women to every ten black men, all too swiftly to a day, in 1870, when there were nearly eleven women to ten men in our Negro population. This was but the outward numerical fact of social dislocation; within lay polygamy, polyandry, concubinage, and moral degradation. They fought against all this desperately, ~~did~~ these black slaves in the West Indies, especially among the half-free artisans; they set up their ancient household gods and when Toussaint and Cristophe founded their kingdom in Haiti, it was based on old African tribal ties and beneath it was the mother-idea.

The crushing weight of slavery fell on black women. Under it there was no legal marriage, no legal family, no legal control over children. To be sure, custom and religion replaced here and there what the law denied, yet one has but to read advertisements like the following to see the hell beneath the system:

"One hundred dollars reward will be given for my two fellows, Abram and Frank. Abram has a wife at Colonel Stewart's, in Liberty County, and a mother at Thunderbolt and a sister in Savannah."

"- William Roberts. Walthourville, 5th January 1839

"Fifty dollars reward -- Ran away from the subscriber, a Negro girl named Maria. She is of a copper color, between thirteen and fourteen years of age - bareheaded and barefooted. She is small for her age - very sprightly and very likely. She stated she was going to see her mother at Maysville."

"- Sanford Thomson

"Fifty dollars reward -- Ran away from the subscriber, his Negro man Pauladore, commonly call Paul. I understand General R. Y. Hayne has purchased his wife and children from H. L. Pinckney, Esq., and has them now on his plantation at Goose Creek, where, no doubt, the fellow is frequently lurking."

"-T. Davis"

The Presbyterian synod of Kentucky said to the churches under their care, in 1835:

no P "Brothers and sisters, parents and children, husbands and wives, are torn asunder and permitted to see each other no more. These acts are daily occurring in the midst of us. The shrieks and agony often witnessed on such occasions proclaim, with a trumpet tongue, the iniquity of our system. There is not a neighborhood where these heartrending scenes are not displayed. There is not a village or road that does not behold the sad procession of manacled outcasts whose mournful countenances tell that they are exiled by force from all that their hearts hold dear."

A sister of a president of the United States declared:

no P "We southern ladies are complimented with the names of wives, but we are only the mistresses of seraglios."

Out of this, what sort of black woman could be born into the world of today? There are those (persons) who hasten to answer this query in writing terms and who say lightly and repeatedly that out of black slavery came nothing decent in womanhood, that adultery and uncleanness was their heritage

no ¶ Fortunately so exaggerated a charge is humanly impossible of ~~truth~~ brood. The half-million women of Negro descent who lived at the beginning of the nineteenth century had become the mothers of two and one-fourth million daughters at the time of the Civil War and five million granddaughters in 1910. Can all these women be vile and the hunted race continue to grow in wealth and character? Impossible. Yet to save from the past the shreds and vestiges of self-respect has been a terrible task, / I most sincerely doubt if any other race of women could have brought its fineness up through so devilish a fire. ~~As~~ ¶ Alexander Crummell once said of his sister in the blood: "In her girlhood all the delicate tenderness of her sex has been rudely outraged. In the field, in the rude cabin, in the press-room, in the factory, / she was thrown into the companionship of coarse and ignorant men. No chance was given her for delicate reserve or tender modesty. From her childhood she was the doomed victim of the grossest passion. All the virtues of her sex were utterly ignored. If the instinct of chastity asserted itself, then she had to fight like a tiger for the ownership and possession of her own person and oftimes had to suffer pain and lacerations for her virtuous self-assertion. When she reached maturity, all the tender instincts of her womanhood were ruthlessly violated. At the age of marriage - always prematurely anticipated under slavery - she was mated as the stock of the plantation were mated not to be the companion of a loved and chosen husband, but to be the breeder of human cattle for the field or the auction block."

31-6-26

Down in such mire has the black motherhood of this race struggled, starving ~~its~~ her own wailing offspring to nurse to the world their swaggering masters; welding for ~~their~~ her children chains which affronted even the moral sense of an unmoral world. Many a man and woman in the South has lived in wedlock as holy as Adam and Eve and brought forth their brown and golden children, but because the darker woman was helpless, her chivalrous and whiter mate could cast her off at his pleasure and publicly sneer at the body he had privately blasphemed.

I shall forgive the white South much in its final judgment day; - I shall forgive its slavery, for slavery is a world-old habit; I shall forgive its fighting, for a well-lost cause, ~~and~~ remembering that struggle with tender tears; I shall forgive its so-called "pride of race," the passion of its hot blood, and even its dear, old, laughable strutting and posing, - but one thing I shall not forgive, neither in this world nor the world to come, in its wanton and continued and persistent insulting of the black womanhood which it sought and seeks to prostitute to its lust. I cannot forget that it is such southern gentlemen into whose hands smug northern hypocrites of today are seeking to place our women's eternal destiny, - men who insist on withholding from my mother and wife and daughter those signs and appellations of courtesy and respect which elsewhere he withholds only form bawds and courtesans.

The result of this history of insult and degradation has been both fearful and glorious. It has birthed the haunting prostitute, the brawler, and the beast of burden; but it has also given the world an efficient womanhood, whose strength lies in ~~its~~ her freedom and whose chastity was won in the teeth of temptation and not in swaddling clothes.

To no modern race does its women mean so much as to us nor come so near to the fulfillment of its meaning. As one of our women writes:

> "Only the black woman can say 'when and where I enter, in the quiet, undisputed dignity of my womanhood, without violence, and without suing or special patronage, then and there the whole Negro race enters with me.'"

They come first, in earlier days, like foam flashing on dark, silent waters - bits of stern, dark womanhood here and there tossed almost carelessly aloft to the world's notice. First and naturally they assumed the panoply of the ancient African mother of men - strong and black, whose very nature beat back the wilderness of oppression and contempt. Such a one was that dousin of my grandmother, whom western Massachusetts remembers as "Mum Bett." Scarred for life by a blow received in defense of a sister, she ran away to Great Barrington and was the first slave, or one of the first, to be declared free under the Bill of Rights of 1780. The son of the judge ~~that~~ who freed her, writes:

no ¶ "Even in her humble station, she had, when occasion required it, an air of command which conferred a degree of dignity and gave her an ascendency over those of her rank, which is very unusual in persons of any rank or color. Her determined and resolute character, which enabled her to limit the ravages of ~~a~~ Shay's mob, was manifested in her conduct and deportment during her whole life. She claimed no distinction, but it was yielded to her from her superior experience, energy, skill, and sagacity.

Having known this woman as familarly as I knew either of my parents, I cannot believe in the moral or physical inferiority of the race to which she belonged. The degradation of the African must have been otherwise caused than by natural inferiority." ¶ It was such strong women ~~that~~ who laid the foundations of the great Negro church of today, with its three and a half-million members and fifty-six millions of dollars in property. One of the early mothers of the church, Mary Still, writes thus quaintly, in the forties:

no ¶ "When we were as castouts and spurned from the large churches, driven from our knees, pointed at by the proud, neglected by the careless, without a place of worship, Allen, faithful to the heavenly calling, came forward and laid the foundation of this connection. The women, like the women at the sepulchre, were early to aid in laying the foundation of the temple and in helping to carry up the noble structure and in the name of their God set up their banner; most of our aged mothers are gone from this to a better state of things. Yet some linger still on their staves watching with intense interest the ark as it moves over the tempestuous waves of opposition and ignorance."

no ¶ But the labors of these women stopped not here, for they knew well that they were subject to affliction and death. For the purpose of mutual aid, they banded themselves together in society capacity, that they might be better able to administer to each others' sufferings and to soften their own pillows. So we find the females in the early history of the church abounding in good works and in acts of true benevolence."

From such spiritual ancestry came two striking figures of war time, - Harriet Tubman and Sojourner Truth.

For eight or ten years previous to the breaking out of the Civil War, Harriet Tubman was a constant attendant at anti-slavery conventions, lectures, and other meetings; she was a black woman of medium size, smiling countenance, with her upper front teeth gone, attired in coarse but neat clothes, and carrying always an old fashioned reticule at her side. Usually as soon as she sat down she would drop off in sound sleep.

She was born a slave in Maryland, in 1820, and bore the marks of the lash on her flesh, and had been made partially deaf and perhaps to some degree mentally unbalanced by a blow on the head in her childhood. Yet she was one of the most important agents of the Underground Railroad and a leader of the fugitive slaves. She ran away in 1849 and went to Boston in 1854 when where she was welcomed into the homes of the leading abolitionists and where everyone listened with tense interest to her strange stories. She was absolutely illiterate, with no knowledge of geography and yet year after year she penetrated the slave states and personally led North over three hundred fugitives without losing a single one. A standing reward of $10,000 was offered for her, but as she said in her PATOIS: "The whites cannot catch up, for I was born with a charm and the Lord had given me the power." She was one of John Brown's closest advisers and only severe sickness prevented her presence at Harper's Ferry.

When the war cloud broke, she hastened to the front, flitting down along her own mysterious paths, haunting the armies in the field, and serving as guide and nurse and spy. She followed Sherman in his great march to the sea and was with Grant at Petersburg and always in the camps the Union officers silently saluted her.

The other woman belonged to a different type, - a tall, gaunt, black, unsmiling sybil, weighted with the woe of the world. She ran away from slavery and giving up her own name took the name of Sojourner Truth. She says: "I can remember when I was a little, young girl, how my old mammy would sit out of doors in the evenings and look up at the stars and groan and I would say, 'Mammy, what makes you groan so?' and she would say, 'I am groaning to think of my poor children; they do not know where I be and I don't know where they be. I look up at the stars and they look up at the stars!"

Her determination was founded on unwavering faith in ultimate good. Wendell Phillips says that he was once in Faneuil Hall, ~~where~~ when Frederick Douglass was one of the chief speakers. Douglass had been describing the wrongs of the colored race and as he proceeded he grew more and more excited and finally ended by saying that they had no hope of justice from the whites, no possible hope except in their own right arms. It must come to blood! They must fight for themselves. Sojourner Truth was sitting, tall and dark, on the very front seat facing the platform and in the hush of feeling when Douglass sat down she spoke out in her deep, peculiar voice, heard all over the ~~house~~ hall: "Frederick, is God dead?"

Such strong, primitive types of Negro womanhood in America seem to some to exhaust its capabilities. They know less of a not more worthy, but a finer type of black woman where in trembles all that delicate sense of beauty and striving for self-realization, which is as characteristic of the Negro soul as is its quaint strength and sweet laughter. George Washington wrote in grave and gentle courtesy to a Negress, in 1776, that he would "be happy to see" at his headquarters at any time, a person "to whom nature has been so liberal and beneficial in her dispensations." This child, Phillis Wheatley, sang her tried and halting strain to a world that wondered and could not produce her like. Measured today her muse was slight and yet, feeling her striving spirit, we call to her still in her own words: "Through thickest glooms look back, immortal shade."

Perhaps even higher than strength and art looms human sympathy and sacrifice as characteristic of Negro womanhood. Long years ago, before the Declaration of Independence, Kate Ferguson was born in New York. Freed, widowed, and bereaved of her children before she was twenty, she took the children of the streets of New York, white and black, to her empty arms, taught them, found them homes, and with Dr. Mason of Murray Street Church, established the first modern Sunday school in Manhattan. Sixty years later came Mary Shadd ~~up out~~ of Delaware. She was tall and slim, of that ravishing dream-born beauty--that twilight of the races, which we call mullatto. Well-educated, vivacious, with determination shining from her sharp eyes, she threw herself singlehanded into the great Canadian pilgrimage when thousands of hunted black men hurried northward and crept beneath the protection of the lion's paw. She became teacher, editor, and lecturer, tramping afoot through winters snows, pushing without blot or blemish through crowd and turmoil to conventions and meetings, and finally becoming recruiting agent for the United States government in gathering Negro soldiers in the West.

After the war, the sacrifice of Negro women for freedom and uplift is one of the finest chapters in their history. Let one life typify all: Louise DeMortie, a free born Virginia girl, who lived most of her life in Boston. Her high forehead, swelling lips, and dark eyes marked her for a woman of feeling and intellect. She began a successful career as a public reader. Then came the war and the call. She went to the orphaned colored children of New Orleans, - out of freedom into insult and oppression and in the teeth of yellow fever. She toiled and dreamed. In 1887 she had raised money and built an orphan home and that same year, in the thirty-fourth of her young life, she died, saying simply: "I belong to God."

As I look about me today in this veiled world of mine, despite the noiser and more spectacular advance of my brothers, I instinctively feel and know that it is the five million women of my race who really count. Black women (and women whose grandmothers were black) are today furnishing our teachers; they are the main pillars of those social settlements which we call churches; and they have with small doubt raised three-fourths of our church property. If we have today, as seems likely, over a billion dollars of accumulated goods, who shall say how much of it has been wrung from the hearts of servant girls and washerwomen and women toilers in the fields? As makers of two million homes these women are today seeking in marvelous ways to show forth our strength and beauty and our conception of the truth.

In ~~this land~~ the United States in 1910 there were 4,941,882 women of Negro descent; over twelve hundred thousand of these were children, another million were girls and young women under twenty, and two and a half-million were ~~grown women.~~ adults. As a mass these women were unlettered,-a fourth of those from fifteen to twenty-five years of age were ~~bein~~ unable to write. These women are passing through, not only a moral, but an economic revolution. Their grandmothers married at twelve and fifteen, but ~~twenty-seven~~ per cent of these women today who have passed fifteen are still ~~single.~~ unmarried.

Yet these black women toil and toil hard. There were in 1910 two and a half-million Negro homes in the land. Out of these walked daily two-million women and girls over ten years of age to work - over half the colored female population, as against a fifth in the case of white women. These, then, are a group of workers, fighting for their daily bread like men; independent and approaching economic freedom! They furnished a million farm laborers, 80,000 farmers, 22,000 teachers, 600,000 servants and washerwomen, and 50,000 in trades and merchandising.

The family group, however, which is the ideal of the culture with which these folk have been born is not based on the idea of an economically independent working mother. Rather its ideal harks back to the sheltered harem with the mother emerging at first as nurse and homemaker, while the father

~~men~~ remains ~~as~~ the sole breadwinner. What is the inevitable result of the class of such ideals and such facts in the colored group? Broken families. Among native whites one women in ten is separated from her husband by death, divorce, or desertion. Among Negroes the ratio is one in seven. Is the cause racial? No, it is economic, because there is the same high ratio among the white foreign born. The breaking up of the present family is the result of modern working and sex conditions and it hits the laborers with terrible force. The Negroes are put in a peculiarly difficult position, because the wage of the male breadwinner is below the standard, ~~for~~ while the openings for colored women in certain lines of domestic work are many. Thus while toil holds the father and brother in country and town at low wages, ~~call~~ the sisters and mothers are called to the city. As a result, the Negro women out number the men nine or ten to eight in many cities, making what Charlotte Gilman bluntly calls "cheap women."

What shall we say to this new economic equality in a great laboring class? Some people within and without the race deplore it. "Back to the homes with the women," they cry, "and higher wage for the men." But how impossible this is has been shown by war conditions. Cessation of foreign migration has raised Negro mens' wages, to be sure--but it has not only raised Negro womens' wages, but opened to them a score of new avenues of earning a living. Indeed, here, in microcosm, and with differences emphasizing sex equality, is the industrial history of labor in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. We cannot abolish the new economic freedom of women. We cannot imprison ~~them~~ women again in a home or require them on pain of death to all be nurses and housekeepers.

What is today the message of these black women to America and the world? The uplift of woman is, next to the problem of the color line and the peace movement, ~~the~~ our greatest modern cause. When, now, two of these movements - woman and color - combine in one, the combination has deep meaning.

In other years woman's way was clear: to be beautiful, to be petted, to bear children. Such ~~was~~ has been their theoretic destiny and if perchance they have been ugly, hurt, and barren, that has been forgotten with studied silence. In partial compensation for this narrowed destiny (perfectly suited to but few) the white world has lavished its politeness on its womankind - its chivalry and bows, its uncoverings and courtesy - all the accumulated homage disused for courts and kings and craving exercise. The revolt of white women against this preordained destiny has in these latter days reached splendid proportions, but it is the revolt of an aristocracy of brains and ability - the middle class and rank and file still plod on in the appointed path, paid by the homage, the almost mocking homage, of men.

From black women of America, however, (and from some others, too, but chiefly from black women and their daughters' daughters,) this gauze has been withheld and without semblance of such apology they have been frankly trodden under the feet of men. They are and have been objected to and objected to apparently for reasons peculiarly exasperating to reasoning beings. When in this world a man comes forward with a thought, a deed, a vision, we ask not, how does he look, but what is his message? It is of but passing interest whether or not the messenger is beautiful or ugly--the message is the thing. This, which is axiomatic among men, has been in past ages but partially true if the messenger ~~was~~ were a woman. The world still wants to ask that a woman primarily be pretty and if she is not, the mob ~~pous and~~ asks querulously, What else are women for? Beauty "is its own excuse of being," but there are other excuses, as most men know, and when the white world objects to black women because it does not consider them beautiful, the black world of right asks two questions: What is beauty? Suppose you think them ugly, what then? If ugliness and unconventionality and eccentricity of face and deed does not bind men from doing the world's work and reaping the world's reward, why should it bind women?

Other things being equal, all of us, black and white, would prefer to be beautiful in face and form and suitably clothed; but most of us are not and one of the mightiest revolts of the century is against the devilish decree that no woman is a woman who is not by present standards a beautiful woman. This decree the black women of America have in large measure escaped from the first. Not being expected to be merely ornamental, they have girded themselves for work, instead of adorning their bodies simply for play. Their sturdier minds have concluded that if a woman be clean, healthy, and educated, she is as pleasing as God wills and far more useful than most of her sisters. If in addition to this she be pink and white and straight-haired, and some of her fellow men prefer this, well and good; but if she be black and brown and crowned in curled mists, this is surely the flimsiest excuse for spiritual incarceration or banishment. The very attempt to do this in the case of Negro Americans has strangely overreached itself. By so much as the defective eyesight of the white world rejects black women as beauties, by so much the more it needs them as human beings - an enviable alternative, as many a white woman knows. Consequently, for black women alone, as a group, "handsome is that handsome does" and they are asked to be no more beautiful than God made them, but they are asked to be efficient, to be strong, fertile, muscled and able to work. If they marry, they must as independent workers be able to help support their children, for their men are paid on a scale ~~that~~ which makes sole support of the family impossible. On the whole, colored working women are paid as well as whites for similar work, save in some higher grades, while colored men get from one-fourth to three-fourths less than white men. The result is curious and three-fold: The economic independence of black women is increased, the breaking up of Negro families must be more frequent, and the number of illegitimate children is decreased more slowly among them than other evidences of culture are increased, just as was once true in Scotland and Bavaria.

What does this mean? It forecasts a mighty dilemma which the world of civilization, despite its will, must one time frankly face: The unhusbanded mother or the childless wife. God send us a world with woman's freedom and married motherhood inextricably wed, but until He sends it, I see more of future promise in the betrayed girl-mothers of the black belt than in the childless wives of the North and I have more respect for the colored servant who yields to her frank longing for motherhood than for her white sister who offers up children for clothes. Out of a sex freedom ~~that~~ which today makes us shudder will come in time a day when we will no longer pay men for work they do not do, for the sake of their harem; we will pay women what they earn and insist on their working and earning it; we will allow those persons to vote who know enough to vote, whether they be black or female, white or male, and we will ~~ward~~ stop race suicide, not by further burdening the overburdened, but by honoring motherhood, even when the sneaking father shirks his duty.

31-6-36

"Wait till the lady passes, "said a Nashville white boy,
"She's no lady; she's a ~~nigger~~ Negro, "answered another.

So some few women are born free and ~~some~~ others amid insult and scarlet letters achieve freedom; but our women in black had freedom thrust contemptuously upon them. With that freedom they are buying an untrammelled independence and dear as the price they pay for it, it will in the end be worth every taunt and groan. Today the dreams of the mothers are coming true. We have still our poverty and degradation, our lewdness and our cruel toil; but we have, too, a vast group of women of Negro blood who for strength of character, cleanness of soul, and unselfish devotion of purpose, is today easily the peer of any group of women in the civilized world. And more than that, in the great rank and file of our five million women we have the up-working of new revolutionary ideals, which must in time have vast influence on the thought and action of this land. For this, their promise, and for their hard past, I honor the women of my race. Their beauty, their dark and mysterious beauty of midnight eyes, crumpled hair, and soft, full-featured faces, is perhaps more to me than to you, because I was born to its warmth and subtle spell; but their worth is yours as well as mine. No other women on earth could have emerged from the hell of force and temptation ~~that~~ which once engulfed and still surrounds black women in America with half the modesty and womanliness ~~that~~ which they retain. I have always felt like bowing myself before them in all abasement, searching to bring some tribute to these long suffering victims, these burdened sisters of mine, whom the world, the wise, white world, loves to affront and ridicule and ~~wantonly to~~ insult. I have known the women of many lands and nations--I have known and seen and lived beside them, but none have I known more sweetly feminine, more unswervingly loyal, more desperately earnest, and more instinctively pure in body and in soul than the daughters of my black mothers. This, then, - a little thing - to their memory and inspiration.

CHILDREN OF THE MOON

I am dead;
Yet somehow, somewhere,
In Time's weird contradiction, I
May tell of that dread deed, wherewith
I brought to Children of the Moon
Freedom and vast salvation.

I was a woman born,
And trod the streaming street
~~That~~ which ebbs and flows from Harlem's hills,
Through caves and canons limned in light,
Down to the twisting sea.

That night of nights,
I stood alone and at the end,
Until the sudden highway to the moon,
Golden in splendor,
Became too real to doubt.

Dimly I set foot upon the air,—
I fled, I flew, through thrills of light,
With all about, above, below the whirring
Of almighty wings.

31-6-38

I found a twilight land,
Where, hardly hid, the sun
Sent softly saddened rays of Red and brown to burn the iron earth
And bathe the snow-white peaks
In mighty splendor.

Black were the men,
Hard haired and silent slow,
Moving as shadows,
Bending with face of fear to earthward;
And women there were none.

"Woman, woman, woman!"
I cried in mounting terror.
"Woman and child!"
And the cry sang back Through heaven, with the Whirring of almighty wings.

Wings, wings, endless wings,—
Heaven and earth are wings;
Wings that flutter, furl, and fold,
Always folding and unfolding,
Ever folding yet again;
Wings, veiling some vast
And veiled face,
In blazing blackness,
Behind the folding and unfolding,
The rolling and unrolling of Almighty wings!

31-6-43

I saw the black men huddle,
Fumed in fear, falling face downward;
Vainly I clutched and clawed,
Dumbly they cringed and covered,
Moaning in mournful monotone:

O Freedom, O Freedom,
O Freedom over me;
Before I'll be a slave,
I'll be buried in my grave,
And go home to my God,
And be free.

It was an angel music
From the dead,
And ever, as they sang,
Some winged thing of wings, filling all heaven,
Folding and unfolding, and folding yet again,
Tore out their blood and entrails
'Til I screamed in utter terror,
And a silence came;—
A silence and the wailing of a babe.

Then, at last, I saw and shamed;
I knew how these dumb dark and dusky things
Had given blood and life,
To fend the caves of underground,
The great black caves of utter night,
Where earth lay full of mothers
And their babes.

31-6-40

Little children sobbing in darkness,
Little children crying in silent pain,
Little mothers rocking and groping and struggling,
Digging and delving and groveling,
Amid the dying-dead and dead-in-life,
And drip and dripping of warm, wet blood,
Far, far beneath the wings,
The folding and unfolding of almighty wings.

I bent with tears andppitying hands,
Above these dusky star-eyed children,- Crinkly haired, with sweet-sad baby voices,
Pleading low for light and love and living-
And I crooned:

Little children weeping there,
God shall find your faces fair;
Guerdon for your deep distress,
He shall send His tenderness;
For the tripping of your feet
Make a mystic music sweet;
In the darkness of your hair,
Light and laughter in the air-
Little children weeping there,
God shall find your faces fair!

I strode above the stricken, bleeding men;
The rampart 'ranged against the skies,
And shouted:
"Up, I say, build and slay;
Fight face foremost, force a way,
Unloose, unfetter, and unbind;
Be men and free!"

31-6-41

Dumbly they shrank,
Muttering they pointed toward that peak,
Than vastness vaster,
Whereon a darkness brooded,
"Who shall look and live," they sighed;
And I sensed
The folding and unfolding of almighty wings.

Yet did we build of iron, bricks, and blood;
We built a day, a year, a thousand years,
Blood was the mortar,—blood and tears,
And, ah, the thing, the thing of wings,
The winged, folding wing of things,
Did furnish much mad mortar
For that tower.

Slow and ever slower rose the towering task,
And with it rose the sun,
Until at last on one wild day,
Wind-whirled, cloud-swept and terrible,
I stood beneath the burning shadow
Of the peak,
Beneath the whirring of almighty wings,
While downward from my feet
Streamed the long line of dusky faces
And the wail of little children sobbing under Earth.

Alone, aloft,
I saw through firmaments on high
The drama of Almighty God,
With all its flaming suns and stars.

"Freedom!" I cried,
"Freedom!" cried heaven, earth and stars,
And a voice near-far,
Amid the folding and unfolding of almighty wings,
Answered, "I am Freedom-
Who sees my face is free-
He and his."

I dared not look;
Downward I glanced on deep bowed heads and closed eyes,
Outward I gazed on flecked and flaming blue-
But ever onward, upward flew
The sobbing of small voices;—
Down, down, far down into the night.

Slowly I lifted livid limbs aloft;
Upward I strove: the face, the face;
Onward I reeled: the face, the face!
To beauty wonderful as sudden death
Or horror horrible as endless life-
Up! Up! the blood-built way; (Shadow grow vaster!
Terror come faster!)
Up! Up! to the blazing blackness
Of one veiled face,
And endless folding and unfolding,
Rolling and unrolling of almighty wings.
The last step stood!
The last dim cry of pain
Fluttered across the stars-
And then-

31-6-39

Wings, wings, triumphant wings,
Lifting and lowering, waxing and waning,
Swinging and swaying, twirling and whirling,
Whispering and screaming, streaming and gleaming,
Spreading and sweeping and shading and flaming-Wings, wings, eternal wings,
'Til the hot, red blood,
Flood fleeing flood,
Thundered through heaven and mine ears,
While all across a purple sky,
The last vast pinion
Trembled to unfold.

I rose upon the Mountain of the Moon;
I felt the blazing glory of the sun;
I heard the Song of Children crying, "Free!"
I saw the Face of Freedom-
And I died.

THE IMMORTAL CHILD

It is now nearly eighteen years since I first saw Coleridge-Taylor. We were in London in some sombre hall where there were many peoples meeting men and women called chiefly to the beautiful World's Fair at Paris; and then a few slipped over to London to meet Pan-Africa. We were there from Cape Colony and Liberia, from Haiti and the States, and from the Islands of the Sea. I remember the stiff young officer who came with credentials from Menelik of Abyssinia; I remember the bitter, black American who whispered how an army of the Soudan might some day cross the Alps; I remember Englishmen, like the Colensos, who sat and counselled with us; but above all, I remember Coleridge-Taylor. ¶ He was a little man and nervous, with dark, golden face and hair that bushed and strayed. His fingers were always nervously seeking hidden keys and he was quick with enthusiasm, - instinct with life. His bride of a year or more, - dark, too, in her whiten way, - was of the calm and quiet type. Her soft contralto voice thrilled us often as she sang, while her silences were full of understanding.

31-6-45

¶ Several times we met in public gatherings and then they bade me to their home, - a nest of a cottage, with gate and garden, hidden in London's endless rings of suburbs. I dimly recall through these years a room in a cozy disorder, strewn with music - music on the floor and music on the chairs, music in the air, as the master rushed to the piano now and again to make some memory melodious - some allusion real.

And then, at last, for it was the last, I saw Coleridge-Taylor in a mighty throng of people crowding the Crystal Palace. We came in facing the stage and scarcely dared look around. On the stage was a full orchestra, a chorus of eight hundred voices, and some of the world's famous soloists. He left his wife sitting beside me and she was very silent as he went forward to lift the conductor's baton. It was one of the earliest renditions of "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast." We sat at rapt attention and when the last, wierd music died, the great chorus and orchestra rose as a man to acclaim the master; he turned toward the audience and then we turning for the first time saw that sea of faces behind - the misty thousands whose voices rose to one strong shout of joy! It was a moment such as one does not often live. It seemed, and was, prophetic.

The young man, who ~~in those days~~ stepped forth as one of the most notable of modern English composers, had a simple and uneventful career. His father was a black surgeon of Sierra Leone who came to London ~~for~~ to study. While there he met an English girl and the son was born in London in 1875. The boy was of those fortunate beings who are not called to wanderjahre, but are born with sails set and seas charted. Already the baby of four little years was a musician and as choir boy and violinist, he walked unhesitatingly and surely to his life work. He was graduated with honors from the Royal Academy of Music in 1894 and married soon after the daughter of one of his professors. Then his life began and whatever it lacked of physical adventure in the conventional round of a modern world city, it more than gained in the almost tempestuous outpouring of his spiritual nature. Life to him was neither meat nor drink, - it was creative flame; ideas, plans, melodies, glowed within him. To create, to do, to accomplish- to know the white glory of mighty midnights and the pale Amen of dawns was his day of days. Songs, piano-forte and violin pieces, trios and quintets for strings, incidental music, symphony, orchestral and choral works, rushed from his fingers. Nor were they laboriously contrived or light, thin things made to meet sudden popularity. Rather they were the flaming bits ~~that~~ which must be said and sung - ~~that~~ which could not wait the slower birth of years, ~~but~~ so hurried to the world as though their young creator knew God gave him but a day. His whole active life was scarcely more than a decade and a half and yet in that time, without wealth, friends, or influence, and in the face of perhaps the most critical and skeptical and least imaginative civilization of the modern world, he wrote his name so high as a creative artist that it cannot soon be forgotten.

And this was but one side of ~~the man:~~ Coleridge-Taylor. On the other was the sweet tempered, sympathetic comrade, always willing to help, never knowing how to refuse, and generous with every nerve and fibre of his being. Think of a young musician, father of a family, who at the time of his death held positions ~~of~~ a associate of the Royal College of Music, ~~a~~ professor in Trinity College and Crystal Palace, conductor of the Handel Choral Society and the Rochester Choral Society, principal of the Guildhall School of Music, where he had charge of the choral choir, the orchestra, and the opera. He was repeatedly the leader of music festivals all over Great Britain and a judge of contests. And with all this his house was open in cheering hospitality to friends and his hand was ever ready with sympathy and help.

When such a man dies, it must bring pause to a reasoning world. We may call his death sickness, pneumonia, but we all know that it was sheer overwork - the using of a delicately tuned instrument too commonly and continuously and carelessly to let it ~~live~~ live its normal life. We may well talk of the waste of wood and water, of food and fire, but the real and unforgivable waste of modern civilization is the waste of ability and genius - the killing of useful, indispensable men who have no right to die; who deserve not for themselves, but for the world, leisure, freedom from distraction, expert medical advice and intelligent sympathy. Coleridge-Taylor's life work was not ~~done~~ finished - it was but well begun. He lived only his first period of creative genius when melody and harmony flashed and fluttered in subtle, compelling, and more than promising profusion. He did not like to do the organized, constructive work in the full, calm power of noonday, the reflection ~~finishing~~ finished of evening. In the annals of the future his name must always stand high, but with the priceless gift of years, who can say where it might not have stood.

Why should he have worked so breathlessly, & almost furiously? It was, we may be sure, because with unflinching determination and no thought of surrender he faced the great alternative - the choice which the cynical, thoughtless, busy, modern world, / threats grimly before its greater souls - food or beauty, bread and butter, or ideals. And continually we see worthier men turning to the pettier, cheaper thing - the popular portrait, the sensational novel, the jingling song, / the choice is not always between the least and the greatest, the high and the empty, but only too often between starvation and something. When, therefore, we see a man, working desperately to earn a living and still stooping to no paltry dickering and, no unworthy work, handing away a "Hiawatha" for less than a song, pausing for glimpses of the stars when a world full of charcoal glowed far more warmly and comfortably, we know that such a man is a hero in a sense never approached by the swash-buckling soldier or the lying patriot.

Deep as was the primal tragedy in the life of Coleridge-Taylor, there lay another still deeper. He smiled at it lightly, as we all do, we who live within the veil, - to hide the deeper hurt. He had, with us, that divine and African gift of laughter, that echo of a thousand centuries of suns. I mind me how once he told of the bishop, the well groomed English bishop, who eyed the artist gravely, with his eye-glass-hair, his color and his figure, - and said quite audibly to his friends, "Quite interesting - looks intelligent, - yes - yes!"

Fortunate was Coleridge-Taylor to be born in Europe and to speak a universal tongue. In America he could have had no career. His genius was, to be sure, recognized (with some palpitation and consternation) when it came full grown across the seas with an English imprint; but had it been born here, it would never have been permitted to grow. We know in America how to discourage, choke, and murder ability when it so far forgets itself as to choose a dark skin. England, thank God, is more civilized; but even there the path of this young man was no way of roses and just a shade thornier than that of whiter men. He did not complain at it - he did not no ¶ Rather the hint here and there of color discrimination in England aroused in him deeper and more poignant sympathy with his people ~~around~~ throughout the world. He was one with that great company of mixed blooded men: Pushkin and Dumas, Hamilton and Douglass, Browning and perhaps Beethoven himself; but he more than most of these men knew the call of the blood when it came and listened and answered. ¶ Coleridge-Taylor ~~He~~ came to America with strange enthusiasm. He took with quite simple and unconscious grace ~~and~~ the conventional congratulations of the musical world. He was used to that. But to his own people - to the sad sweetness of their voices, their inborn sense of music, their broken half-articulate voices - he leapt with new enthusiasm. From the fainter shadowings of his own life, he sensed instinctively the vaster tragedy of theirs. His soul yearned to give voice and being to this human thing. He early turned to the sorrow songs; he sat at the faltering feet of Paul Lawrence Dunbar / and ~~he~~ asked (as we sadly shook our heads) for some master piece of this world tragedy ~~that~~ which his soul could set to music. And then, so characteristically, he rushed back home, composed a half dozen exquisite harmonies haunted by slave songs, led the Welsh in thier singing, listened to the Scotch, ordered great music festivals in all English, wrote for Beerbohm Tree, took on another music professorship, was promised a trip to Germany, and at last staggering one night in his home, coming to his wife and little boy and girl, he fell in his tracks and in four days was dead, at the age of thirty-seven.

"Wince and cry aloud,"

no ¶ They say that in his death throe, he arose and facing some great, ghostly choir raised his last baton, while all around the massive silence rang with the last mist music of his dying ears.

no ¶ He was buried from St. Michael's on September 5, with the acclaim of kings and music masters and little children and to the majectic melody of his own music. The tributes ~~that~~ which followed him to his grave were unusually hearty and sincere. ¶ The head of the Royal College calls the first pro-know it all by heart.

If he had been black, like Paul Laurence Dunbar, would the argument have been different? No. He should never have been born, for he is a problem. He should ~~never be~~ not think of ion educated, for he cannot be educated. He should never marry, for that means children and there is no place for black children in this world.

In the treatment of the child the world foreshadows its own future and faith. All words and all thinking lead to the child - to that vast immortality and wide sweep ~~and~~ & infinite possibility which the child represents. Such thought as this it was that made men say of old as they saw baby faces: No P "And whosoever shall offend one of these little ones, it is better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck and he were cast into the sea."

And yet the mothers and fathers and the men and women of my race must often pause and ask: Is it worth while? Ought children be born to us? Have we ~~a~~ any right to make human souls face what we face today? The answer is clear: If the great battle of human right against poverty, against disease, against color prejudice is to be won, it must be won not in our day, but in the day of our children's children. Ours is the blood and dust of battle; theirs the rewards of victory. If, then, they are not there because we have not brought them in to the world, we have been the guiltiest factor in conquering ourselves. It is our duty, then, to accomplish the immortality of black blood, in order that the day may come in this dark world when poverty shall be abolished, privilege be based on individual desert, and the color of a man's skin be no bar to the outlook of his soul.

If it is our duty as honest colored men and women, battling for a great principle, to bring not aimless rafts of children to the world, but as many as, with reasonable sacrifice, we can train to largest manhood, what in its inner essence shall that training be, particularly in its beginning? Our first impulse is to shield our children absolutely.

The first temptation, then, is to shield the child, to hedge it about that it may not know and will not dream. Then when we can no longer wholly shield, to indulge and pamper and coddle, as though in this dumb way to compensate. From this attitude comes the multitude of our spoiled, wayward, disappointed children, and must we not blame ourselves? For while the motive was pure and the outer menace undoubted, is shielding and indulgence the way to meet it?

Some Negro parents, realizing this, leave their children to sink or swim in this sea of race prejudice. They neither shield nor explain, but thrust them forth grimly into school or street and let them learn as they may from brutal fact. Out of this may come strength, poise, self-dependence and out of it, too, may come bewilderment, cringing deception and self-distrust. It is, all said, a brutal, unfair method and in its way as bad as shielding and indulgence. Why not rather face the facts and tell the truth? Your child is wiser than you think.

The truth lies ever between extremes. It is wrong to introduce the child to race consciousness prematurely. It is dangerous to let that consciousness grow spontaneously without intelligent guidance. With every step of dawning intelligence explanation - frank, free, guiding explanation - must come. The day will dawn when mother must explain gently but clearly why the little girls next door do not want to play with ~~"niggers;"~~ Negroes what the real cause is of the teachers' unsympathetic attitude; and how people may ride in the backs of street cars and the smoker end of trains, and still be people, honest high-minded souls.

Remember, too, that in such frank explanation you are speaking in nine cases out of ten to a good deal clearer understanding than you think and that the child mind has what your tired soul may have lost faith in - the power and the glory.

Out of little unspoiled souls rise up wonderful resources and healing balm. Once the colored child understands the world's attitude and the shameful wrong of it, you have furnished it with a great life motive - a power and impulse toward good which is the mightiest thing man has. How many white folks would give their own souls if they might graft into their children's souls a great, moving, guiding ideal!

With this power ther comes in the transfiguring soul of childhood the glory: The vision of accomplishment--the lofty ideal. Once let the strength of the motive work and it becomes the life task of the parent to guide and shape the ideal; to raise it from resentment and revenge to dignity and self-respect, to breadth and accomplishment, to human service; to beat back every thought of cringing and surrender.

Here, at last, we can speak with no hesitating, with no lack of faith. For we know that as the world grows better there will be realized in our children's lives that for which we fight unfalteringly but vainly now.

Armed with this vision and moral home training, how shall our children fare in the formal training of the schools?

Consider this argument: Education is the training of men for life. The best training is experience, but if we depended entirely upon this, each generation would begin where the last began and civilization could not advance.

We must, then, depend largely on oral and written tradition and on such bits of typical experience as we can arrange for the child's guidance to life.

More than that, children must be trained in the technique of earning a living and doing their part of the world's work.

But no training in technique must forget that the object of education is the child and not the things he makes.

Moreover, a training simply in technique will not do because general intelligence is needed for any trade and the technique of trades changes.

31-6-53

Indeed, by the careful training of intelligence and ability, civilization is continually getting rid of the hardest and most exhausting toil and giving it over to machines, leaving human beings freer for higher pursuits and self-development.

Hence, colored people in educating their children should be careful:

FIRST: To conserve and select ability, giving to their best minds higher college training.

SECOND: They should endeavor to give all their children the largest possible amount of generll training and intelligence before teaching them the technique of a particular trade, remembering that the object of all true education is not to make men carpenters, but to make carpenters men.

Is not this reasoning sound? Could you imagine an educator of any experience who wouod take material exception to it? Would you call it revolutionary or in the nature of a "personal" attack?

Certainly not.

Yet this very argument, with illustrations and emphasis delivered to some seven hundred apparently well-pleased folk once upon a time in Indianapolis, had the most astounding resluts. The Indianapolis Star in a leading editorial denounced it as "dangerous!"

A leading white philantropist of abolition forbears considered it not only "misleading" and "mischievous," but a covert and damaging personal attack, because she was on the school board!

The su ervisor of the colored schools of Indianapolis wrote to express regret that the lecture had seemed to attack his school curriculum and ideals and the assistant superintendent of schools in the District of Columbia hastened to give advice!

Yet, where is the flaw in the argument?

Ther is no flaw, but there are serious flaws in the thinking of some of these critiss.

31-6-54

The first flaw is the naive assumption that the paraphernalia of a school shows the education it is imparting. If some people seek a Greek book and a cap and gown, they conclude that the boy between them is receiving higher education. But is he? That depends. If other people see a hammer, a saw and a cook book, they conclude that ehe boy who uses them is being trained in intelligence, ability and the earning of a living. But is he? That depends.

When the proud principal of a school shows workshop and kitchen, table and pie, one may be interested, but one is no more convinced than when another shows an array of Greek roots and rounded phrases. One must merely remark: The end of education is neither the table nor the phrase-it is the boy; what kind of boys are you training here? Are they boys quickened in intelligence, with some knowledge of the world they live in? Are they trained in such ways as to discover their true bent and ability, and to be intelligently guided to the choice of a life work? Then your system is right. Otherwise it is wrong and not all the gingham dresses in Indiana will justify it.

The second flaw is the more or less conscious determination of a certain folk to use the American public-school system for the production of laborers who will do the work they want done. To them Indianapolis exists for the sake of its factories and not the factories for the sake of Indianapolis. They want dinners, chairs and motor cars and they want them cheap; therefore use the public schools to train servants, carpenters and mechanics. It does not occur to them to think of workingmen as existing for their own sakes. What with impudent maids and half-trained workingmen, they are tired of democracy; they want caste, a place for everybody and everybody in his father's place with themselves on top and "niggers" at the bottom where they belong. To such folk the problem of education is strikingly simple. To teach the masses to work, show them how to do things, increase their output, give them intelligence, of course; but this as a means, not as an end, and be careful of too much of it. Of course, if a meteoric genius bursts his birth's invidious bar, let him escape, but keep up the bars and as most men are fools, treat them and train them as such.

31-6-55

It was such darkened counsels as these that brought the French Revolution. It is such mad logic as this that is at the bottom of the social unrest today.

The lecturer came to Indianapolis not to criticise, but to warn- not to attack, but to make straight the way of the Lord. He is no despiser of common humble toil; God forbid! He and his fathers before him have worked with their hands at the lowliest occupations and he honors any honest toilers at any task, but he makes no mistake here. It is the toilers that he honors, not the task-the man and not the thing. The thing may or may not be honorable-the man always is.

Yet the despising of men is growing and the caste spirit is rampant in the land; it is laying hold of the public schools and it has the colored public schools by the throat, North, East, South and West. Beware of it, my brothers and dark sisters; educate your children. Give them the broadest and highest education possible; train them to the limit of their ability, if you work your hands to the bone in doing it. See that your child gets not the highest task, but the the bestfitted to his ability, whether it be digging dirt or painting landscapes, remembering that our recognition as common folk by the world depends on the number of men of ability we produce-not great geniuses, but efficent thinkers and doers in all lines.

But why am I talking simply of "colored" children? Is not problem of their education simply an intensification of the problem of educating all children? Look at our plight here in the United States, nearly 150 years after the establishment of a government, based on human intelligence.

If we take the figures of the Thirteenth Census, we find that there were in that year five and one-half million illiterate Americans of whom 3,184,633 were whites. Remembering that illiteracy is a crude and exteme test of ignorance we may assume that there are in the United States ten million people over teh years of age who are too ignorant either to perform their civic duties or to reach industrial efficiency. Moreover, it does not seem that this illiteracy is disappearing as rapidly as it should.

For instance, nine per cent of American children between ten and nineteen cannot read and write or 818,550 and if we take merely the white children, we find that 371,104 of th children from ten to nineteen years of age cannot read and write. Moreover, there are millions of children who, judging by the figures for the school year 1909-10 are not going to learn to read and write, for of the Americans six to fourteen years of age there were 3,125,392 who were not in school a single day during that year. If we take the eleven millions youth fifteen to twenty years of age for whom vocational training is particularly adapted, we find that nearly five per cent of these or 448,414 are absolutely illiterate. It is not too much to assume thata million of them have not acquired enough of the ordinary tools of intelligence to make the most of efficient vocational training.

Confining ourselves to the white people, over fifteen of the white children six to fourteen years of age or 2,253,198 did not attend school during the school year 1909-10. Of the native white children of native parents ten to fourteen years of age nearly a tenth were not in school during that year. 121,878, native whites of native parents in the flower of youth, fifteen to nineteen years of age, were illiterate.

If we confine our attention to the colored children, the case is, of course, much worse.

We cannot hope to make intelligent workmen and intelligent citizens of a group, over forty percent of whose children six to fourteen years of age were not in school a single day during 1909-10; and for the other sixty percent the school term in the majority of cases was probably less than five months. Of the Negro children ten to fourteen years of age 18.9 percent were illiterate; of those fifteen to nineteen years of age 20.3 percent were illiterate; to those from ten to fourteen the school-going age, 31.4 percent did not go to school a single day in 1909-10.

What is the trouble? It is simple. We are spending one dollar for education where we should spend ten. If tomorrow we multiplied our effort to educate the next generation ten-fold, we should but begin our bounden duty. The heaven that lies about our infancy is but the ideals come true which every generation of children is capable of bringing; but we, selfish in our own ignorance and incapacity, are making of education a series of miserable compromises: How ignorant can we let a child grow to be in order to make him the best cotton mill operative? What is the least sum that will keep the average youth out of jail? How many months saved on a high school course will make the largest export of wheat?

If we realized that children are the future, that immortality is the present child, that no education that educates can possibly be/to costly, then we know that the menace of Kaiserism that called for the expenditure of more than 125 thousand millions of dollars was not a whit more pressing than the menace of ignorance and that no nation tomorrow will call itself civilized which does not give every single human being college and vocational training free and under the best teaching force procurable for love or money.

This world has never taken the education of children seriously. Misled by selfish dreamings of personal life forever, they have neglected the true and practical immortality through the endless life of children's children. Seeking counsels of their own souls' perfection, they have despised and rejected the perfectly possible perfection of unending generations. Or if they are thrown back in pessimistic despair from making living folk decent, they leap to idle speculations of a thousand years hereafter instead of working steadily and persistently for the next generation.

All our problems center in the child. All our hopes, our dreams are for our children. Has our own life failed? Let its lesson save the children's lives from similar failure. Is democracy a failure? Train up citizens that will make it succeed. Is wealth too scarce, too foolish in form, and too easily stolen? Train up workers with honor and consciences and brains. Have we degraded service with menials? Abolish the mean spirit and implant sacrifice. Do we despise women? Train them as workers and thinkers and not as play-things, lest future generations ape our worst mistake. Do we despise dark races? Teach the children its fatal cost in spiritual degradation and murder, teach them that to hate "niggers" or "chinks" is to crucify souls like their own. Is there anything we would accomplish with human beings? Do it with the immortal child, with a stretch of endless time for doing it and with infinite possibilities to work on.

Is this our attitude toward education. It is not - neither in England nor America - in France nor Germany - with black nor white nor yellow folk. Education to the modern world is a burden which we are driven to carry. We shirk and complain. We do just as little as possible and only threat or catastrophe induc s us to do more than a minimum. If the ignorant mass, panting to know, revolts, we dol them gingerly enough knowledte to pacify them temporarily. If, as in the Great War, we discoger soldiers too ignorant to use our machines of murder an destruction, we train them - to use machines of murder and destruction. If mounting wealth calls for intelligent workmen, we rush tumultuously to train workers- in order to increase our wealth. But of great, broad plans to train all men for all things - to make a uni erse intelligent, busy, good, creative and beautiful-where in this vide world is such an educational program? To announce it is to invite gasps or Brobdingnagian laughter. It cannot be done. It will cost too much.

What has been done with man can be done with men, if the world tries long enough and hard enough. And as to cost - all the wealth of the world, save that necessary for sheer decent existence and the maintenance of past civilization, is and of right ought to be the property of the children for their education.

I mean it. In one year 1917, we spent 96,700,000,000 dollars for war. We blew it away to murder, maim dnd destroy.

Why?

Because the blind, brutal crime of powerful and selfish interests made this path through hell the only visible way to heaven.

We did it. We had to do it and we are glad the putrid horror is over.

But, now, are we prepared to spend less to make a world impossible for the resurgence of such devilish power?

Do we want war really to cease?

The educate the children of this generation at a cost no whit less and if necessary a hundred times as great as the cost of the Great War.

Last year, 1917 education cost us $915,000,000 dollars.

Next year it ought to cost us at least two thousand million dollars. We should spend enough money to hire the best teaching force possible - the best organizing and directing ability in the land, even if we have to strip the railroads and meat-trust. We should dot city and country with the most efficient, sanitary and beautiful school-houses the world knows and we should give every American child common school, high school and college training and then vocational guidance in earning a living.

Is this a dream?

Can we afford less?

31-6-60

Consider our so-called educational "problems:" "How may we keep pupils in the high school?" Feed and clothe them. "Shall we teach Latin, Greek and mathematics to the 'masseses?'" If they are worth teaching to anybody, the masses need them most. "Who shall go to college?" Everybody. "When shall culture training give place to technical education for work?" Never.

These questions are not "problems." They are simply "excuses" for spending less time and money on the next generation. Given ten millions of dollars a year, what can we best do with the education of a million children, and the real answer is kill nine hundred and ninety thousand quickly and not gradually and make thoroughly trained men and women of the other ten thousand. But who set the limit of ten million dollars? Who says it shall not be ten thousand millions, as it ought? You and I say it and in saying it we sin against the holy ghost.

We sin because in our befuddled brains we have linked money and education inextricably. We assume that only the wealthy have a real right to education when, in fact, being born is being given a right to college training. Our wealth today is, we all know, distributed mainly by chance inheritance and personal favor and yet we attempt to base the right to education on this foundation. The result is grotesque. We bury genius. We send it to jail. We ridicule and mock it and we send mediocrity and idiocy to college, gilded and crowned. For a hundred years we have denied black folk education and now we exploit them to a graping world: See how ignorant and degraded they are! All they are fit for is education for cotton-picking and dish-washing. When Dunbar and Taylor happen along, we cough and forget.

A world guilty of this last and mightiest war has no right to enjoy or create until it has made the future safe from another Louvain or Rheims. There is but one patent way proved and inescapable,-immortality, and that lies in the hands of the immortal child.

A HYMN TO THE PEOPLES

O Truce of God!
And primal meeting of the Sons of Man,
Foreshadowing the union of the World!
From all the ends of earth we come!
Old Night, the elder sister of the Day,
Mother of Dawn in the golden East.
Meets in the misty twilight with her brood,
Pale and black, tawny, red and brown,
The mighty human rainbow of the world,
Spanning its wilderness of storm.

Softly in sympathy the sunlight falls,
Rare is the radiance of the moon;
And on the darkest midnight blaze the stars-
The far-flown shadows of whose brillance
Drop like a dream on the dim shores of Time,
Forecasting Days that are to these
As day to night.

So sit we all as one.
So, gloomed in tall and stone-swathed groves,
The Buddha walks with Christ!
And Al-Kôran and Bible both be holy!

31-6-62

Almighty Word!
In this Thine awful sanctuary,
First and flame-haunted City of the Widened World,
Assoil us, Lord of Lands and Seas!
We are but weak and wayward men,
Distraught alike with hatred and vainglory;
Prone to despise the Soul that breathes within-
Hish visioned hordes that lie and steal and kill,
Shinning the sin each separate heart disclaims ,
Clambering upon our riven writhing selves,
Besieging Heaven by trampling men to Hell!

We be blood-gulity! Lo, our hands be red!
Not one may blame the other in this sin!
But here-her in the white silence of the dawn,
Before the womb of time,
With bowed hearts all flame and shame,
We face the birth-pangs of a world:
We hear the stifled cry of nations all but born-
The wail of women ravished of their stunted brood!
We see the nakedness of Toil, the poverty of Wealth,
We know the anarchy of empire, and doleful death of life!
And hearing, seeing, knowing all, we cry:

31-6-63

Save us, world-spirit, from our lesser selves!
Grant us that war and hatred cease,
Reveal our souls in every race and hue!
Help us, O human God, in this Thy Truce
To make-humanity divine!

OF BEAUTY AND DEATH

For long years of days we of the world gone wild have looked into the face of death and smiled. Through all oour bitter tears we knew how beautiful it was to die for that which our souls called sufficient, like all true beauty this thing of dying was so simple, so matter-of-fact. The boy clothed in his splendid youth stood before us and laughed in his own jolly way - went and was gone. Suddenly the world was full of the fragrance of sacrifice. We left our digging and burden bearing, we turned from our scraping and twisting of things and words, we paused from our hurrying hither and thither and talking up and down and asked in half-whisper - this death - is this life? And is its beauty real or false? And of this heart questioning I am writing.

31-6-65

My friend, who is pale and positive, said to me yesterday, as the tired sun was nodding:

"You are too sensitive."

I admit," I am, - sensitive. I am artificial. I cringe or am bumptious or immobile. I am intellectually dishonest, art-blind and I lack humor."

"Why don't you stop all this," she retorts triumphant.

You will not let us.

"There you go, again. You know that I -------"

"Wait! I answer. Wait!"

I arise at seven. The milkman has neglected me. He pays little attention to colored districts. My white neighbor glares elaborately. I walk softly, lest I disturb him. The children jeer as I pass to work. The women in the street car withdraw their skirts or prefer to stand. The policeman are truculent. The elevator man hates to serve Negroes. My job is unsecure because the white union wants it and does not want me. I try to lunch, but no place near will serve me. I go forty blocks to Marshall's, but the Committee of Fourteen closes Marshall's. They say white women frequent it.

"Do all eating places discriminate?"

No, but how shall I know which do not - except -

I hurry home through crowds. They mutter or get angry. I go to a mass meeting. They stare. I go to a theatre. "We don't admit niggers!"

Or perhaps I leave the beaten track. I seek new work. "our employees would not work with you," our customers would object."

I ask to help in social uplift.

"Why - er - we will write you."

I enter the free field of science. Every laboratory door is closed and no endowments are available.

I seek the universal mistress, art - the studio door is locked.

31-6-66

I write literature. "We cannot publish stories of colored folks of that type" - its the only type I know. This is my life. It makes me idiotic, it gives me artificial problems. I hesitate, I rush, I waver. In fine - I am sensitive.

My pale friend looks at me with disbelief and curling tongue.

"Do you mean to sit there and tell me that this is what happens to you each day? "Certainly not," I answer low.

"Then you only fear it will happen?

I fear. "Well, haven't you the courage to rise above a - almost a craven fear?"

Quite - Quite craven is my fear, I admit; but the terrible thing is - these things do happen.

"But you just said" -

They do happen. Not all each day - surely not. But now and then - now seldom, now. sudden; now after a week, now in a chain of awful minutes; not everywhere, but anywhere in Boston, in Atlanta. That's the hell of it. Imagine spending your life looking for insults or for hiding places from them - shrinking (instinctively and despite desperate bolsterings of courage) from blows that are not always but ever; not each day, but each week, each month, each year. Just perhaps as you have choked back the craven fear and cried, "I am and will be the master of my --"

"No more tickets down stairs - here's one to the smoking gallery."

You hesitate. You beat back your suspicions. After all, a cigarette with Charlie Chaplin - then a man pushes by - "Three in the orchestra." - "Yes, Sir" and in he goes. Suddenly your heart chills. You turn yourself away toward the golden twinkle of the purple night and hesitate again. What's the use? Why not always yield - always take what's offered,-always bow to force, whether of cannons or dislike? Then the great fear singes in your soul - the real fear - the fear beside which other fears are vain imaginings - the fear lest right there and then you are losing your own soul,- that you are losing your own soul and th e soul of a people; that millions of unborn children, black and gold and nauve, are being there and then despoiled by you because you are a coward and dare not fight. Suddenly that silly orchestra seat and the cavorting of a commedian with funny feet become matters of life, death and immortality; you grip the pillars of the universe and strain as you sway back to that befrilled ticket girl. You grip your soul forriot and murder. You choke and sputter and she seeing that you are about to make a "fuss" obeys her orders and throws the tickets at you in contempt. Them you slink to your seat and crouch in the darkness before the film, with every tissue burning. The miserable wave of reaction engulfs you. To think of compelling puppies to take your hard earned money, fattening hogs hale you and yours, forcing your way among cheap and tawdry idiots - God! What a night of pleasure!

Here th n is beauty and ugliness, a wide vision of world sacrifice. a fierce gleam of world hate. Which is life and whatis death and how shall we face so tantalizing a contradiction? Any explanation must be necessarily subtle and involved. No pert and easy word of encouragement, no merely dark despair, can lay hold of the roots of these things. And first and before all we cannot fo get that this world is beautiful. Grant all its ugliness and sin - the petty horrible snarl of its putred threats which few have seen more near or more often than I - notwithstanding all this the beauty of this world is not to be denied.

Casting my eyes about I dare not let them rest on the beauty of love and friend, for even if my tongue were cunning enough to sing this, the revelation of reality here is too sacred and the fancy is untrue. Of one world beauty alone may at once be brutally frank - and though the least of beauties it is divine!

And so, too, there are depths of human degradation which it is not fair to probe. With all their horrible prevalance, we cannot call them natural. But may we not compare the least of the world's beauty with the least of its ugliness not murder, starvation and rapine, with love and friendship and creation - but the glory of sea and sky and mountain with the little hatefulnesses and thoughtlessnesses of race prejudice that out of such juxtaposition we may, perhaps, deduce some rule of beauty and life - or death?

There mountains hurl themselves against the stars and at their feet lie black and leaden seas. Above float clouds white, grey and inken and about the clear, impalpable air springs and sparkles like new wine. Last night we floated on the calm bosom of the sea in the southermost haven of Mount Desert. The water flamed and sparkled. The sun had gone, but above the crooked back of cumulus clouds, dark and pink with radiance, and on the other sky aloft to the eastward, piled the gorgeous curtained mists of evening. The radiance faded and a shadowy velvet veiled the mountains, a humid depth of gloom behind which lurked all mysteries of life and death, while above the clouds hung ashen and dull, lights twinkled and flashed along the shore, boats glided in the twilight and the little puffing of motors droned away. Then was the hour to talk of life and the meaning of life, while above gleamed silently, suddenly, star on star.

Bar Harbor lies beneath a mighty mountain, a great bare black mountain that sleeps above the town, but as you leave rises suddenly, threatenly, until far away on Frenchman's Bay its looms above the town in withering vastness, as if to call all that little world petty save itself. Beneath the cool wide stare of that great mountain men cannot live as giddily as in some lesser summer's play ground. Before the unveiled face of nature as it lies naked on the Maine coast rises a certain human awe.

God moulded this world largely and mightily off this marvelous coast and meant that in the tired days of life men should come and worship here and renew their spirit. This I have done and returning I go to work again. As we go over, the mountains of Mount Desert rise and greet us on the moving world, yet conscious of their everlasting strength.

About us beats the sea - the sail-blecked restless sea, humming its tune about our flying keel, unmindful of the voices of men. The land sinks to meadows, black pine forests, with here and there a blue and mistful mountain. Then there are islands - bold rocks above the sea, curled meadows; through and about them rool ships, weather-beaten and patched of sail, strong hulled and smoking, light gray and shinnng. All the colors of the sea lie about us - gray and yellowing greens and doubtful blues, blacks not quite black, tinted silvers and golds and dreaming whites. Long tongues of dark and golden land lick far out into the tossing waters and the white gulls sail and scream above them. It is a mighty coast - ground out and pounded, scarred, crushed and carven in massive, frightful lineaments. Everywhere stand the pines - the little dark and steadfast pines that smile not, neither weep, but wait and wait. Near us lie isles of flesh and blood, white cottages, tiled and meadowed. Afar lie shadow lands, high mist hidden hills, mountains boldly limned - yet shading to the sky, faint and unreal.

We skirt the fine clad shores, chary of men, and know how bitterly winter kisses these lonely shores to fill yon row of beaked ice houses that creep up the hills. We are sailing due westward and the sun, yet two hours high, is blazoning a fiery glory on the sea that shreads and gleams like some broad jewelled trail to where the blue and distant shadow land lifts its carven front aloft, leaving as it gropes, shades of shadows beyond.

Why do not those who are scarred in the world's battle and hurt by its hardness, travel to these places of beauty and drown themselves in utter joy of life? I asked this once sitting in a southern home. Outside the spring of a Georgia February was luring gold to the bushes and languor of the soft air. Around me sat color in human flesh - brown that crimsoned readily; dim soft yellow that escaped description, cream-like duskiness that shadowed to rich tints of autumn leaves. And yet a suggested journey in the world brought no response.

"I should think you would like to travel," said the white one.

But no, the thought of a journey seemed to depress them. It is this way they said, speaking now successively now at once.

Did you ever see a "Jim-Crow" waiting room? There are always exceptions, as at Greensboro - but usually no heat in vinter and no air in summer; undisturbed loafers and train hands and broken, disreputable settees; to buy a ticket is torture, you stand and stand and wait and wait until every white person at the "other window" is waited on. Then the tired agent yells across, because all the tickets and change are over there -

"What d'y' want? "WHAT! WHERE?"

He browbeats and contredicts you, hurries and confuses the ignorant, gives many the wrong change, compels number to purchase tickets on the train at a higher price and sends you and me out on the platform, burning with indignation and hatred.

The "Jim-Crow" car is up next the baggage car and engine. It stops out beyond the covering in the rain or sun or dust. Usually there is no step to help you climb on and often the car is a smoker cut in two and you must pass through the white smokers or else they pass through your part, with swagger and noise and stares. Your apartment is a half or a quarter or an eighth of the oldest car in service on the road. Unless it happens to be a through express, the plush is caked with dirt, the floor is grimy and the windows dirty. An impertinent white newsboy occupies two seats at the end and importunes you to the point of rage to buy cheap candy, Coco-Cola and worthless, if not vulgar, books. He yells and swaggers and a continued stream of white men saunters back and forth from the smoker to buy and hear. The white train crew from the baggage car uses the "Jim-Crow" to lounge in and perform their toilet. The conductor appropriates two seats for himself and his papers and yells gruffly for your tickets before the train has scarcely started. It is best not to ask him for information even in the gentlest tones. His information is for whites chiefly. It is difficult to get lunch or clean water. Lunch rooms either "don't serve niggers" or serve them at some dirty and ill-attended hole in the wall. As for toilet rooms - don't! If you have to change cars, be wary of junctions which are usually without accommodation and filled with quarrelsome whites who hate a "darky dressed up." You are apt to have the company of a sheriff and a couple of meek or sullen black prisoners on part of your way and dirty colored section hands will pour in toward night and drive you to the smallest corner.

"No - said the little lady in the corner (she looked like an ivory cameo and her dress flowed on her like a caress - "We don't travel much."

Pessimism is cowardice. The man who cannot frankly acknowledge the "Jim-Crow" car as a fact and yet live and hope is simply afraid either of himself or the world. There is not in the world a more disgraceful denial of human brotherhood than the "Jim-Crow" car of the southern United States, but, too, just as true, there is nothing more beautiful in the universe than sunset and moonlight on Montego Bay in far Jamaica. And both things are tree, both are facts , both belong to this our world an neither can be denied.

The sun, prepared to cross that awful border which men call Night and Death, marshalls his hosts. I seem to see the spears of mighty horsemen flash golden in the light, empurpled banners flame afar and the low thunder of marching hosts thrills with the thunder of sea. Athwart his own path, screening a face of fire, he throws cloud masses, masking his trained guns. Amd then the miracle is done. The host passes with roar too vast for human ear and the sun is set, leaving the frightened moon and blinded stars.

In the dust the green-gold palms turn their star like faces and stretch their fan like fingers, lifting themselves proudly lest any lordly leaf should know the taint of earth.

Out from the isle the serpent hill thrusts its great len th around the boy shouldering back the waters and the shadows. Ghost rains sweep down smearing his rugged sides, yet on he writhes, undulent with pine and palm, gleaming until his low, sharp head and lambent tongue grown grey and pale and silver in the dying day, kisses the molten gold of the golden sea.

The comes the moon. Like fireflies nesting in the hand of God gleams the city, dim swathed by fairy palms. A long, thin thumb, mist-mighty, points shadowy to the Spanish Main, while through the fingers foam the seven seas. Above the calm and gold green moon, beneath the wind-wet earth and here alone my soul enchained, enchanted.

From such heights of holiness men turn to master the world. All the pettiness of life drops away and it becomes a great battle before the Lord. His trumpet, where does it sound and whither? I go. I saw Montego Bay at the beginning of the world war. The cry for service as high as heaven, as wide as human feeling, seemed filling the earth. What were petty slights, silly insults, paltry problems, beside this call to do and dare and die? We black folk offered our services to fight. What happened? Most Americans have forgotten the extraordinary series of events which worked the feelings of black America to fever heat.

First was the refusal to accept Negro volunteers for the army, except in the four black regiments already established. While the nation was coming the country for volunteers for the regular army, it would not let the American Negro furnish even his proportionate quota of regular soldiers. This led to some grim bantering among Negroes:

Before we had chance to reply to this there came the army draft bill and the proposal by Vardaman and his ilk to except Negroes. We protested to Washington in various ways and while we were insisting that colored men should be drafted just as other citizens, the bill went through with two little "jokers."

First, it provided that Negroes should be drafted, but trained in "separate" units and, secondly, it somewhat ambiguously permitted men to be drafted for "labor."

A wave of fear and unrest spread among Negroes and while we were looking at both these provisions askance, suddenly we received the draft registration blank. It directed persons "of African descent" to "tear off the corner!" Probably never before in the history of the United States has a portion of the citizens been so openly and crassly discriminated against by action of the general government. It was disheartening and on top of it came the celebrated "German plots." It was alleged in various parts of the country with singular unanimity that Germans were working among the Negroes and it was further intimated that this would make the Negroes too dangerous and element to trust with guns. To us, of course, it looked as though the discovery and the proposition came from the same thinly veiled sources.

Considering carefully these series of happenings, the American Negro sensed an approaching crisis and faced a puzzling dilemma. Here was evidently preparing fertile ground for the spread of disloyalty and resentment among the black masses as they were forced to choose apparently between forced labor or a "Jim-Crow" draft. Manifestly when a minority group is thus segregated and forced out of the nation, they can in reason do but one thing - take advantage of the disadvantage. In this case we demanded colored officers for the colored troops.

General Wood was early approached and asked to admit suitable candidates to Plattsburg. He refused. We thereupon pressed the government for a "separate" camp for the training of Negro officers. Not only did the War Department hesitate at this request, but strong opposition arose among colored people themselves. They said that really was going too far. We will obey the law, but to ask for voluntary segregation is to insult ourselves." But strong, sober second thought came to the rescue. We said to our protesting brothers: "We face a condition, not a theory. There is not the slightest chance of our being admitted to white camps; therefore, it is either a case of a "Jim-Crow" officers training camp or no colored officers. Of the two things no colored officers would be the greater calamity."

Thus we gradually made up our minds. But the War Department still hesitated. It was besieged and when it presented its final argument, "We have no place for such a camp," the trustees of Howard University said: "Take our campus." Eventually twelve hundred colored cadets were assembled at Fort Des Moines for training.

The city of Des Moines promptly protested, but it finally changed its mind. The city never before had seen such a class of colored men.

They rapidly became popular with all classes and many encomiums were passed upon their conduct. Their commanding colonel pronounced their work first class and declared that they presented excellent material for officers.

Meantime, with one accord, the though of the colored people turned toward Colonel Young, their highest officer in the regular army. Charles Young is a heroic figure. He is the typical soldier, - silent, uncomplaining, brave and efficient. From his days at West Point throughout his twenty-eight years of service he has taken whatever task was assigned him and permormed it efficiently and there is no doubt but that the army has been almost merciless in the requirements which it has put upon this splendid officer. He came through all vi th flying colors, In Haiti, in Liberia, in western camps, in the Sequoia Forests of California and fianlly with Pershing in Mexico, - in every case he triumphed. Just at the time we were looking to the United States government to call him to head the colored officers training at Des Moines, he was retired from the army, because of "high blood pressure!" There is no disputing army surgeons and their judgment in this case may be justified, but coming at the time it did nearly every Negro in the United States believed that the "high blood pressure" that retired Colonel Young was in the prejudiced heads of the southern oligarchy who were determined that no Negro should ever wear the stars of a General.

To say that Negroes of the United States were disheartened at the retirement of Colonel Young is to put it mildly, but there was more trouble. The provision that Negroes must be trained separately looked simple and was simple in places where there were large Negro contingents, but in the North with solitary Negroes drafted here and there we had some extraordinary developments. Regiments appeared with one Negro where the had to be separated like a pest and put into a house or even a village by himself while the commander frantically telepraphed to Washington. Small wonder that one poor fellow in Ohio solved the problem by cutting his throat. The whole process of drafting Negroes had to be held up until the government could find methods and places for assembling them.

On the top of this came Houston. In a moment the nation forgot the whole record of one of the most celebrated regiments in the U. S. Army and their splendid service in the Indian Wars and in the Philippines. It was the first regiment mobilized in the Spanish-American War and it wast the regiment that volunteered to a man to clean up the yellow fever camps when others hesitated. It was one ofthe regiments to which Pershing said in December :

"Men, I am authorized by Congress to tell you all that our people back in the States are mightly glad and proud at the way the soldiers have conducted themselves while in Mexico, and I, General Pershing, can say with pride that a finer body of men never stood under the flag of our nation than we find here tonight."

The nation, also, forgot the deep resentment mixed with the pale ghost of fear which Negro soldiers call up in the breasts of the white South. It is not so much that they fear that the Negro will strike if he gets a chance, but rather that they assume with curious unanimity that he has REASON to strike, that any other persons in his circumstances or treated as he is would rebel. Instead of seeking to relieve the cause of such a possible feeling, most of them strain every effort to bottle up the black man's resentment. Is it in conceivable that now and then it bursts all bounds, as at Brownsville and Houston?

So in the midst of this mental turmoil came Houston and East St. Louis. At Houston black soldiers goaded and insulted suddenly went wild and "shot up" the town. At East St. Louis white strikers on war work killed and mobbed Negro workingmen. And here are the results:

HOUSTON	EAST ST. LOUIS
Offense	Offense
17 white persons killed	125 Negroes killed
Punishment	Punishment
19 colored soldiers hanged	9 white men imprisoned
51 colored soldiers imprisoned	5-15 years for life	11 white men imprisoned
40 colored soldiers imprisoned	1 year
	18 white men fined
	10 colored men imprisoned
	14 years

Once upon a time I took a great journey in this land to three of the ends of our world and over seven thousand mighty miles. I saw the grim desert and the high rampart of the Rocky Mountains. Three days I flew from the silver beauty of Seattle, to the sombre whirl of Kansas City. Three days I flew from the brute might of Chicago to the air of the angels, scented with golden flowers, of California, where the homes of men crouch low and loving on the good broad earth, as though they were kissing its blossoms. Three days I flew through the empire of Texas - but all these shall be tales untold, for in all this journey I saw but one thing that lived and will live eternal in my soul,-the Grand Canon.

It is a sudden void in the bosom of earth down to its entrails,- a wound where the dull titanic knife has turned and twisted in the hole, leaving its edges livid, scarred, jagged and pulsing, over the white and red and purple of its mighty flesh, while down below-down, down below, in black and severed vein, boils the dull and sullen flood of the Colorado.

It is awful! There can be nothing like it. It is the earth and sky gone stark and raving mad. The mountains uptwirled, disbodied and inverted stand on their peaks and throw their bowels to the sky. Their earth is air - their ether blood-red rock engreened. You stand upon their roots and fall into their pinnacles, a mighty mile.

Behold this mauve and purple mocking of time and space! See yonder peak! No human foot has trod it. Into that blue shadow only the eye of God has looked. Listen to the accents of that gorge which mutters. "Befor Abraham was, I am." Is yonder wall a hedge of black or is it the rampart between heaven and hell? I see greens - is it ~~bracs~~ moss or giant pines? I see specks that may be boulders. Ever the winds sigh and drop into those sun-swept silences. Ever the corpse lies motionless, unmoved, until I fear. It is an awful thing, unholy, terrible. It is human - some mighty drama unseen, unheard, is playing there its tragedies or mocking comedy and the laugh or endless years is shrieking onward from peak to peak, unheard, unechoed and unknown.

31-6-78

One throws a rock into the abyss. It gives back no sound. It falls on silence - the voice of its thunders cannot reach so far. It is not - it cannot be a mere inert, unfeeling, brute fact - its grandeur is too awful - its beauty too divine. It is not red and blue and green, but, ah! the shadows and the shades of all the world, glad colorings touched with a hesitant spiritual delicacy - what does it mean - what does it mean? Tell me, black and boiling water!

It is not real. It is but shadows. The shading of eternity. Last night yonder tesselated palace was gloom - dark, brooding thought and sin, while hither rose the mountains of the sun, golden, blazing, ensanguined. It was a dream. This blue and brilliant morning shows all those burning peaks alight, while here, shapeless, mistful, broods the shadowed towers.

I have been down into the entrails of earth - down, down by straight and staring cliffs - down by sounding waters and stone-strewn meadows; down by green pastures and still waters, by great, steep chasms - down by the gnarled and twisted ists of God to the deep, sad moan of the yellow river that did this thing of wonder, a little winding river with death in its depth and a crown of glory in its flying hair.

I have seen what eye of man was never meant to see. I have profaned the sanctuary. I have looked upon the dread disrobing of the night and yet I live. Ere I hid my head she was standing in her cavern halls, gloving coldly westward - her feet were blackness, her robes, empurpled, flowed mistily from shoulder down in formless folds of folds. Her head pine-crowned was set with jeweled stars. I turned away and dreamed - the canon - the awful, its depths called, its heights shuddered. Then suddenly I rose and looked. Her robes were falling. At dim dawn they hung purplish green and black. Slowly she stripped them from her gaunt and shapely limbs - her cold, grey garments shot with shadows stood revealed. Down dropped the black blue robes, grey-pearled and slipped, leaving a filmy, silken, misty thing and underneath I glimpsed her limbs of utter light.

31-6-79

There is something in the nature of beauty that demands an end. Ugliness may be indefinite. It may trail off into gray, ~~indefinite~~ endlessness. But beauty must be complete - whether it be a field of poppies or a great life, - it must end and the end is part and triumph of the beauty. I know there are those who envisage a beauty eternal. But I cannot. I can dream of great and never-ending procession of beautiful things and visions and acts. But each must be complete or it cannot for me exist because it is unimaginable - unbelievable;

On the other hand, ugliness to me is eternal, but its eternity does not daunt me. There is in it nothing new or unexpected; it is the old evil stretching out; it cannot be worse; it may coil and writhe and recur in endless battle to days without end, but it is the same human ill and bitter hurt. But beauty is fulfilment. It satisfies. It is the reasonable thing. Its end is death - the sweet silence of perfection, the calm and balance of utter music. Therein is the triumph of beauty death.

So strong is the spell of beauty that there are those who contradicting their own knowledge and experience try to say that all is beauty. They are called optimists and they lie. All is not beauty. Ugliness and hate and ill are here with all their contradiction and illogic; they will always be here - perhaps, God send, with lessened volume and force, but here and eternal, while beauty ever triumphs in its great completion - death. We cannot conjure the end of all ugliness in eternal beauty, for beauty by its very being and definition has in each definition its ends and limits, but while beauty lies implicit and revealed in its end, ugliness writhes on forever. So the ugliness of continual birth fulfils itself and conquers gloriously in the beautiful end.

At last to us all comes happiness there in the Court of Peace, where the dead lie so still and calm and good. We lie and listen to the flowers grow. We hear the birds sing and see how the rain rises and blushes and burns and pales and dies in beauty. We see spring summer and the red riot of autumn and then in winter beneath the soft white snow, we sleep and dream of dreams. We know that ten, a hundred and a thousand years, we shall lie at rest, unhurt in the Court of Peace.

Am I winding words meaninglessly and contradictingly, my reader? Perhaps, for I am speaking of things hard to think and harder to say, because they belong to those upper airs of life where the breathing of syllables is difficult.

Let me, then, end this thought and say what I will say in allegory. Two things I fetch from out my heart to tell what my brain will not clearly and completely encompass.

"The Comet" is a fairy tale and the "All-Mother" is a dream of the Great War. With these, good Reader, farewell.

These are the things of which men think, who live: of their own selves and the dwelling place of their fathers; of their neighbors; of work and service; of rule and reason and women and children; of Beauty and Death and War. To this thinking I have only to add a point of view: I have been in the world, but not of it. I have seen the human drama from a veiled corner, where all the outer tragedy and comedy have reproduced themselves in microcosm within. From this inner torment of souls the human scene without has interpreted itself to me in unusual and even illuminating ways. For this reason, and this alone, I venture to write again on themes on which great souls have already said greater words, in the hope that I may strike here and there a half-tone, newer even, if slighter, up from the heart of my problem and the problems of my people.

Between the clearer flights of Logic, I have sought & set some little alightings of what I may be feeling. They are tentative & beauty, unworld & stand alone; yet and perversely, in my mind, now at the end, I know not whether I mean The Thoughts for the Valley — or the Valley for the Thoughts, or why the book hails off to playing, rather than standing, thing on unanswering face. C R E D O

I believe in God, who made of one blood all ~~races~~ nations that ~~dwell~~ do dwell on earth. I believe that all men, black and brown and white, are brothers, varying through time and opportunity, in form and gift and feature, but differing in no essential particular, and alike in soul and the possibility of infinite development.

Especially do I believe in the Negro Race; in the beauty of its genius, the sweetness of its soul, and its strength in that meekness which shall yet inherit this turbulent earth.

I believe in Pride of race and lineage and self; in pride of self so deep as to scorn injustice to other selves; in pride of lineage so great as to despise no man's father; in pride of race so chivalrous as neither to offer bastardy to the weak nor beg wedlock of the strong, knowing that men may be brothers in Christ, even though they be not brothers-in-law.

31-11-64

I believe in Service-humble, reverent service, from the blackening of boots to the whitening of souls; for Work is Heaven, Idleness Hell, and Wage is the "Well done!" of the Master, who summoned all them that labor and are heavy laden, making no distinction between the black, sweating cotton hands of Georgia and the first families of Virginia, since all distinction not based on deed is devilish and not divine.

I believe in the Devil and his angels, who wantonly work to narrow the opportunity of struggling human beings, especially if they be black; who spit in the faces of the fallen, strike them that cannot strike again, believe the worst and work to prove it, hating the image which their Maker stamped on a brother's soul.

I believe in the Prince of Peace. I believe that War is Murder. I believe that armies and navies are at bottom the tinsel and braggadocio of oppression and wrong; and I believe that the wicked conquest of weaker and darker nations by nations whiter and stronger but foreshadows the death of that strength.

~~DARKWATER~~

I believe in Liberty for all men; the space to stretch their arms and their souls; the right to breathe and the right to vote, the freedom to choose their friends, enjoy the sunshine, and ride on the railroads, uncursed by color; thinking, dreaming, working as they will in a kingdom of ~~God~~ Beauty and Love.

I believe in the Training of Children, black even as white; the leading out of little souls into the green pastures and beside the still waters, not for pelf or peace, but for life lit by some large vision of beauty and goodness and truth; lest we forget, and the sons of the fathers, like Esau, for mere meat barter their birthright in a mighty nation.

Finally, I believe in Patience-patience with the weakness of the weak and the strength of the strong, the prejudice of the ignorant and the ignorance of the blind; patience with the tardy triumph of joy and the mad chastening of sorrow,-patience with God!

O Silent God, Thou whose Voice afar in mist and mystery hath left our ears ~~an~~ an-hungered in these fearful days-

Hear us, good Lord!

Listen to us, Thy children: our faces dark with doubt are made a mockery in Thy Sanctuary. With uplifted hands we front Thy Heaven, O God, crying:

We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord!

We are not better than our fellows, Lord; we are but weak and human men. When our devils do deviltry, curse Thou the doer and the deed,-curse them as we curse them, do to them all and more than ever they have done to innocence and weakness, to womanhood and home.

Have mercy upon us, miserable sinners!

And yet, whose is the deeper guilt? Who made these devils? Who nursed them in crime and fed them on injustice? Who ravished and debauched their mothers and their grandmothers? Who bought and sold their crime and waxed fat and rich on public iniquity?

Thou knowest, good God!

Is this Thy Justice, O Father, that guile be easier than innocence and ~~that~~ the innocent ~~be~~ crucified for the guilt of the untouched guilty?

Justice, O Judge of men!

Wherefore do we pray? Is not the God of the fathers dead? Have not seers seen in Heaven's halls Thine hearsed and lifeless form stark amidst the black and rolling smoke of sin, where all along bow bitter forms of endless dead?

Awake, Thou ~~that~~ sleepest!

Thou art not dead, but flown afar, up hills of endless light, through blazing corridors of suns, where worlds do swing of good and gentle men, of women strong and free-far from the cozenage, black hypocrisy, and chaste prostitution of this shameful speck of dust!

Turn again, O Lord; leave us not to perish in our sin!

From lust of body and lust of blood,-

Great God, deliver us!

From lust of power and lust of gold,-

Great God, deliver us!

From the leagued lying of despot and of brute,-

Great God, deliver us!

A city lay in travail, God our Lord, and from her loins sprang twin Murder and Black Hate. Red was the midnight; clang, crack, and cry of death and fury filled the air and trembled underneath the stars when church spires pointed silently to Thee. And all this was to ~~sate~~ the greed of greedy men who hide behind the veil of vengeance!

Bend us Thine ear, O Lord!

In the pale, still morning we looked upon the deed. We stopped our ears and held our leaping hands, but they did they not wag their heads and leer and cry with bloody jaws: Cease from crime! The word was mockery, for thus they train a hundred crimes while we do cure one.

Turn again our captivity, O Lord!

Behold this maimed and broken thing, dear God; it was an humble, black man, who toiled and sweat to save a bit from the pittance paid him. They told him: Work and Raise! He worked. Did this man sin? Nay, but some one told how some one said another did one whom he had never seen nor known. Yet for that man's crime this man ~~lieth~~ lies maimed and murdered, his wife naked to shame, his children, to poverty and evil.

Hear us, O Heavenly Father!

Doth not this justice of hell stink in Thy Nostrils, O God? How long shall the mounting flood of innocent blood roar in Thine ears and pound in our hearts for vengeance? Pile the pale frenzy of blood-crazed brutes, who do such deeds, high on Thine Altar, Jehovah Jireh, and burn it in hell forever and forever!

Forgive us, good Lord; we know not what we say!

Bewildered we are and passion-tossed, mad with the madness of a mobbed and mocked and murdered people; straining at the armposts of Thy throne, we raise our shackled hands and charge Thee, God, by the bones of our stolen fathers, by the tears of our dead mothers, by the very blood of Thy Crucified Christ: What meaneth this? Tell us the plan; give us the Sign!

Keep not Thou silence, O God!

Sit no longer blind, Lord God, deaf to our prayer and dumb to our dumb suffering. Surely Thou, too, art not white, O Lord,-a pale, bloodless, heartless thing!

Ah! Christ of all the Pities!

Forgive the thought! Forgive these wild, blasphemous words! Thou art still the God of our black fathers and in Thy Soul's Soul sit some soft darkenings of the evening, some shadowings of the velvet night.

But whisper—speak—call, great God, for Thy Silence is white terror to our hearts! The way, O God, show us the way and point us the path!

Whither? North is greed and South is blood; within, the coward, and without, the liar. Whither? To death?

Amen! Welcome, dark sleep!

Whither? To life? But not this life, dear God, not this! Let the cup pass from us, tempt us not beyond our strength, for there is that clamoring and clawing within, to whose voice we would not listen, yet shudder lest we must,—and it is red, Ah! God! It is a red and awful-shaped,

Selah!

In yonder East trembles a star.

Vengeance is Mine; I will repay, saith the Lord!

Thy Will, O Lord, be done!

Kyrie Eleison!

Lord, we have done these pleading, wavering words.

We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord!

We bow our heads and hearken soft to the sobbing of women and little children.

We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord!

Our voices sink in silence and in night.

Hear us, good Lord!

THE RIDDLE of the SPHINX

Dark daughter of the lotus leaves that watch the Southern Sea!
Wan spirit of a prisoned soul a-panting to be free!
The muttered music of thy streams, the whisper of the deep,
Have kissed each other in God's name and kissed a world to sleep.

The will of the world is a whistling wind, sweeping a cloud-swept sky,
And not from the East and not from the West knelled that woul-waking cry, But out of the South,—the sad, black South—it screamed from the top of the sky,
Crying: "Awake, O ancient race!" Wailing, "O woman, arise!"
And crying and sighing and crying again as a voice in the midnight cries,—
But the burden of white men bore her back and the white world stifled her sighs.

The white world's vermin and filth:
All the dirt of London,
All the scum of New York;
Valiant spoilers of women
And conquerors of unarmed men;
Shameless breeders of bastards,
Drunk with the greed of gold,
Baiting their blood-stained hooks
With cant for the souls of the simple;
Bearing the white man's burden
Of liquor and lust and lies!

Unthankful we whine in the East,
Unthankful we wail from the westward,
Unthankfully thankful, we curse,
In the unworn wastes of the wild:
I hate them Oh!
I hate them well,
I hate them, Christ!
As I hate hell!
If I were God,
I'd sound their knell
This day!
Who raised the fools to their glory,
But black men of Egypt and Punt,
Ethiopia's sons of the evening,
Indians and yellow Chinese,
Indonesian children of morning,
And mongrels of Rome and Greece?
Ah, well!
And they that raised the bastards
Shall drag them down again,—
Down with the theft of their thieving
And murder and mocking of men;
Down with their barter of women
And laying and lying of creeds;
Down with their cheating of childhood
And drunken orgies of war,— down down deep down,
Till the devil's strength be shorn

40/10/22

Till some dim, darker David, a-hoeing of his corn,
And married maiden, mother of God,
Bid the black Christ be born!
Then shall our burden be manhood,
Be it yellow or black or white;
And poverty and justice and sorrow,
The humble and simple and strong
Shall sing with the sons of morning
And daughters of even-song;
Black mother of the iron hills that ward the blazing sea,
Wild spirit of a storm-swept soul, a-struggling to be free,
Where 'neath the bloody finger-marks thy riven bosom quakes,
Thicken the thunders of Man's Voice and lo!
a world awakes!

Darkwater, 1920

"He-attacked-my wife," he gasped. The mob snarled and worked silently. Right to the limb of the red oak they hoisted the struggling, writhing black man, while others lifted the dazed woman. Right and left as she tottered to the house she searched for the stranger, with a sick yearning, but the stranger was gone. And she told none of her guest.

"No-no-I want nothing," she insisted, until they left her, as they thought, asleep. For a time she lay still listening to the departure of the mob. Then she rose. She shuddered as she heard the creaking of the limb where the body hung. But resolutely she crawled to the window and peered out into the moonlight; she saw the dead man writhe. He stretched his arms out like a cross, looking upward. She gasped and clung to the window sill. Behind the swaying body, and down where the little, half-ruined cabin lay, a single flame flashed up amid the far-off shout and cry of the mob. A fierce joy sobbed up through the terror in her soul-and then sank abashed as she watched the flame rise. Suddenly whirling into one great crimson column it shot to the top of the sky and threw great arms athwart the gloom until above the world and behind the roped and swaying form below hung quivering and burning a great crimson cross.

She hid her dizzy, aching head in an agony of tears, and dared not look, for she knew. Her dry lips moved:

"Despised and rejected of men."

She knew, and the very horror of it lifted her dull and shrinking eyelids. There, heaven-tall, earth-wide, hung the stranger on the crimson cross, riven and bloodstained with thorn-crowned head and pierced hands. She stretched her arms and shrieked.

3te-5-44

He did not hear. He did not see. His calm dark eyes all sorrowful were fastened on the writhing, twisting body of the thief, and a voice came out of the winds of the night, saying:

"This day thou shalt be with me in Paradise!"

Of the Ruling of Men

The ruling of men is the effort to direct the individual actions of many persons toward some end. This end theoretically should be the greatest good of all but no human ground has ever reached this ideal being because of ignorance & selfishness. The standard aspired toward should be for the pleasure of One, viz the Ruler, or of the Few – his favorites, or the Rulers, or of many – the Rich, the Privileged, the Powerful. Democratic movements [illegible] grounds & nations are always taking place & are the effort to overcome the wrongs of Ruling. In the 18th century Europe the effort became so brutal & shocking that an attempt was made at universal expression & the philosophy of the movement said that if all united they would rule for all and thus Universal good was sought thru Universal Suffrage.

The unrealized difficulty of this program lay in the wide spread ignorance. The mass of men, even of the more intelligent ones and only knew little about each other and less about the actions of others in grounds and the technique of endeavor in general. They could only ask for universal suffrage therefore in the things they knew or knew practically: They knew personal + mental service, individual craftsmanship, agriculture + barter, = Causes of the Lockout of private property, for public ends + the rights of land. with these matters there they attempted to deal. Under the cry of "Freedom" they greatly reduced the price of collective interests by reduced personal service, receiving the wages of dexterity in handiwork and reduced + regulated public Causes + distributively land ownership. + Credit trade + barter

While they were doing this against obstinate resistance a whole new organization of work suddenly appeared. The suddenness of this "Industrial Revolution" of the 19th century was hardly fortuitous — as the case of Wallis tea-kettle — hardly a natural development as in the matter of shoeing, but largely the deliberate of powerful + intelligent individuals + secure the benefits of knowledge persons — as in the case of American Slavery + Cotton.

The result was on the one hand a vast + unprecedented development of Wickedness, Life + Civilization in the late 19th + early 20th century was Evidently in its whole conception Purpose + accomplishment: The office of life was + made goods. Now before this giant aspect of things

The new democratic revolt against autocratic & violent & cruel rule because it did not understand: an irresistible Kingdom of Trade Business & Commerce ruled the world & before its threshold stood Freedom of 18th century Philosophy warding the lords. Some of the very ones who in mediaeval times had the tyranny of the Middle Age accepted the tyranny of the Industrial age

Then came a reaction. Men groaned at "democracy" & politics, and thought with Pope & Philanthropy & rule the world — Pale whisper gave divine right & rule & the Christians & Mohammedans, & Philanthropy & Democracy organized vast schemes of relief & at least stanch the flow of blood on the battle wounds while industry was anarchy.

It was at this time that the lowest laborers who worked & got hundreds least & suffered most began & murder & rebel at anyway there were the American Negroes Their name was Freedom & therefore true Russians all thrilling & palpitating with human feeling. Negroes it has been roughly told how had no lords & therefore American Philanthropy freed the slave. In South the Negro remained

by Lincoln's surrender

by armed rebellion, by sullen refusal to work, by running away to the North & Canada, by giving brave & powerful example to the agitation of the abolitionists & by furnishing 200,000 soldiers & ~~last~~ many ~~three~~ as many Confederate soldiers in the civil ~~second~~ war ~~which~~ was not a war for Negro freedom but a ~~civil and industrial~~ duel between two industrial systems one of which was doomed & could & became it was an anachronism & the other bound to succeed because of the Industrial Revolution

After 1870 the Negro was freed the Philanthropic support & activity & his education the Philosophy of Democracy handed down from the 18th century, ~~while on the other hand the former owners & their economic allies sought & fetched their industrial emancipation by refusing the right & use of Negroes. It was in vain that powerful interests fought out & their Evidence of Industry the extreme reversal must & fail in light of democratic advance throughout the world & the Awakening of Democracy in~~

There was a chance here to try democracy anew in a new way, that is against the new industrial oppression with a mass of workers who were not yet in its iron control. With plenty of land widely distributed, staple livelihood like cotton rice and sugar cane, and a thorough system of education there was an unique chance to realize a new modern democracy in contrast to the southern United States which turned from the way of the world. This too is done by closed fisted monied class and tended to a new unity of human beings and an obliteration of human hatreds festering along the color line.

Efforts were begun. The 14th & 15th amendments gave the right to vote to negro and black laborers and they immediately established a public school system and began to attack the land question. The U.S. government was seriously considering the distribution of land & capital — "40 acres and a mule" and the price of cotton stood an easy way to economic independence. Co-operative movements began on a large scale.

But alas! Not only were the former slave-owners solidly arrayed against this experiment but the owners of the industrial world saw disaster in any such beginnings of industrial democracy.

The opposition began its movement on the Color line and Reconstruction became in history a great movement for the full assertion of the white race against the encroachment and attempt of degraded blacks instead of the limited rise of a corps of black & white laborers.

The result was the disfranchisement of the blacks of the south and a world wide attempt to restrict democratic development & white races and to distract them into race hatred against the dark races.

This program dominated although at undoubtedly fluctuating & changed rates the trade of white labor, the greater distribution of wealth and power in the hands of the great European capitalists of Industry and made modern industrial imperialism possible.

This led to renewed efforts on the part of white European workers & industrial and ability then intellectual powers & its reform through democratic control.

Indeed human as communism or Socialism or individual these efforts are needed now more strange non terrible but moved all & seeking an absolutely Just Ideal human ideal — the only ideal that can be sought: The direction of individual activities industry so as to secure the greatest good of all. Marxism has one method of accomplishing this & its passion was the doing away with private property in machines & materials Two mighty attacks were made on this Ideal: one was an attack on the fundamental democratic foundations: modern Socialism with its teaching does not need the good of all, but chiefly of all Socialists. This attack was & virtually unanswered — indeed some of its assaults openly extolled Dogmas and Creeds from their pedestal. Down this it was easy to ship it with their [illegible] Syndicalism which [illegible] Socialism for the skilled labour [illegible] only and leaves the common labour in his bonds

31-11-73

This throws us back on fundamentals. It compels us again to examine the rule of democracy.

Who may be excluded from a share in the ruling of men? Time and time again the world has answered

The ignorant
The ~~inexperienced~~ inexperienced
The ~~immoral~~ guarded
The unwilling

That is the same answer that only the intelligent should rule, or those who desire [illegible] to rule others, or those to whom are ~~not under bereavement guardianship~~ [illegible], or those to whom ardently desire the right.

These restrictions are not arguments for the wide distribution of the ballot — they are rather reasons for restriction addressed to the self-interest of the present real rulers. We may easily for instance "The ignorant ought not to vote". We would say "It would state should be ignorant to participate in government" and this statement is true of the fact!

11.5 No state is civilized which has citizens to ignorant to elect rule it. Or in older words education is not a prerequisite to political control — political control is the cause of popular education. Again to make education

Again what is this theory of benevolent really associate with each other,-~~we associate with our ideas of each other~~ we associate with our ideas of each other, and few people have either the ability or courage to question their own ideas. None have more persistently and dogmatically insisted up on the inherent inferiority of women than the men with whom they come in closest contact. It is the husbands, brothers, and sons of women whom it has been most difficult to induce to consider women seriously or to acknowledge that women have rights which men are bound to respect. So, too, it is those people who live in closest contact with black folk who have most unhesitatingly asserted the utter impossiblity of living beside Negroes who were not ~~either~~ industrial or political slaves ~~and~~ or social pariahs. All this proves that none are so blind as those ~~n~~ nearest the thing ~~seen~~, while, on the other hand, the history of the world is the history of the discovery of the common humanity of human beings among steadily increasing circles of men.

31-11-60

What is the cause of the undoubted reaction and alarm ~~that~~ the citizens of democracy continually feel? It is, I am sure, the failure to feel the full significance of the change of rule from a privileged minority to that of an omnipotent majority, and the failure to assume that mere majority rule is the last word of government; that majorities have no responsibilities, that they ~~but~~ rule by the grace of God. Granted that government should be based on the consent of the governed, does the consent of a majority at any particular time adequately express the consent of all? Has the minority, even though a small and unpopular and unfashionable minority, no right to respectful consideration?

31-11-56

I remember that excellent little high school text book,

easy to give up the dream of democracy ~~here~~? Must industry rule men or may men rule even industry? And unless men rule industry, can they ever hope really to make laws or educate children or create beauty?

Real the problem of the democratization of industry is tremendous but we must deny. We must spread that sympathy and intelligence which tolerates the widest individual freedom despite the necessary public control; we must learn to select for public office ability rather than mere affability. We must shall ready to defer to knowledge and science and judge by result rather than by method and finally we must have the fact that the broad distribution of goods — the question of wages and income is an ethical & not a mere mechanical problem & calls for grave public human judgment & not secrecy & closed doors

All this means time and development: it comes not by complete Revolution of a day, nor yet by instant Evolution of a thousand years — it comes daily but by bit and check by check as men and women learn and grow and as children are trained in truth.

THE CALL

In the land of the Heavy Laden came once a dreary day. And the king, who sat upon ~~the~~ a Great, White Throne, raised ~~up~~ his eyes and saw afar off how the hills around were hot with hostile feet and the sound of the mocking of his enemies struck anxiously on ~~the king's~~ his ears, for the king loved his enemies. So the king lifted ~~up~~ his hand, and in the glittering silence, and spake softly, saying: "Call the Servants of the King." Then the herald stepped before the armpost of the throne, and cried: "Thus saith the High and Mighty One, Who inhabiteth Eternity, whose name is Holy, - the Servants of the King." Now, of the servants of the king there were a hundred and forty-four thousand, - tried men and brave, brawny of arm and quick of wit; aye, too, and women of wisdom and marvelous in beauty and grace. And yet on this drear day when the King called, their ears were thick with the dust of the enemy, their eyes were blinded with the flashing of his spears and they hid their faces in dread silence and moved not, even at the King's behest. So the herald called again. And the servants cowered in very shame, but none came forth. But the third blast of the herald struck upon a woman's heart, afar. And the woman straightway left her baking and sweeping and the rattle of pans, ~~And the woman straightway left~~ her chatting and gossiping and the sewing of garments, ~~And the woman~~ and stood before the king, saying: "The servant of thy servants, O Lord."

~~Then~~ The king smiled, - smiled wondrously, so that the setting sun burst through the clouds, and the hearts of the king's men dried hard within them. And the low-voiced King said, so low that even they ~~that~~ listened heard not well: "Go, smite me mine enemies, that they cease to do evil in my sight." And the woman quailed and trembled. Three times she lifted up her eyes unto the hills and saw the heathen whirling onward in their rage. And seeing, she shrank - three times she shrank and crept to the king's feet. "O king," she cried, "I am but a woman," And the king answered: "Go, then, Mother of Men." And the woman said, "Nay, king, but I am still a maid." Whereat the king cried: "O Maid, ~~made Man~~, thou shalt be Bride of God." And yet the third time the woman shrank at the thunder in her ears, and whispered: "Dear God, I am black!" ~~And~~ The king spake not, but swept the veiling of his face aside and lifted up the light of his countenance upon her and lo! it was black.

So the woman went forth ~~on~~ the hills of God to do battle for the King, on that drear day in the land of the Heavy Laden, when the heathen raged and imagined a vain thing.

THE DAMNATION OF WOMEN

I remember from women of my boyhood: Mother, cousin Inez, Emma, and Ida Fuller. They presented the problem of the Widow, the Wife, the Maiden and the outcast. They existed not for themselves but for men; their relations, they were named because of their bonds with men, living and dead. These bonds were the real thing. They were in color, brown and light brown, yellow with brown freckles and white.

They were not beings, they were relations and the relations were enfilmed with mystery and secrecy. We did not know the truth or believe it when we heard it, Motherhood! What was it? We did not know nor greatly care.

My Mother and I were good chums. I liked her. After she was dead I loved her with a free sense of love, personal love.

Inez was a pretty grown cousin, who married. What was marriage? We did not know, neither did she, poor thing! He came too mean for her, a little of children, poverty, a drunken cruel companion, sickness and death, why? why?

There was no sweeter sight than Emma; slim, straight and dainty, darkly blushed with the passion of youth; but her life was a wild awful struggle to crush her natural fierce joy of love. She crushed it and became a cold calculating mockery. Last there was that awful outcast of the town, the white woman, Ide Fuller. What she was we did not know. She stood to us as embodied filth and wrong--but whose filth, whose wrong?

Grown up as I see the problem of these women transfused, I hear all about me the unanswered call of youthful love, none the less glorious because of its clean, honest, physical passion. Why unanswered? because the youth are too poor to marry, or if they marry, too poor to have children. They turn aside then in three directions: to marry for support, what men call shame, or to that which is more evil than nothing.

It is a unendurable paradox, it must be changed or the will totter and fall.

The world wants healthy babies and intelligent workers. Today we refuse to allow the combination and force thousands of intelligent workers to go childless at a horrible expedition of moral force or dam them if they break our idiotic conventions. Only at the sacrifice of her intelligence and her charm to do her best work can the majority of modern women bear children. This is the damnation of women.

E 96-6-14

All womanhood is hampered today because of the world on which it is------ that tries to worship both Virgins and Mothers and in the end despises motherhood and despoil Virgins.

The woman must have a life work and economic independence. They must have knowledge. She must have the right of motherhood at her own discretion. The present mining horror at free womanhood must pass if we are ever to be rid of the bestiality of free womanhood; not by guarding the weak in weakness do we gain strength but by making weakness free and strong.

The world must choose the Free Woman or the White Wraith of the Prostitute. Today it wavers between prostitute and man.

Civilization must show two things: The glory and beauty of creating life, the need and duty of power and intelligence. This and this only will make the perfect marriage of love and work.

Love is God

Love is God

There is no God but Love

And Work is His Prophet!

All this of Woman----but what of Black Woman?

41-6-39A

The world that wills to worship womankind studiously forgets its darker sisters. They seem in a sense to typify that veiled melancholy

"Whose saintly visage is too bright
To his the sense of human sight,
And therefore to our weaker view
O'er laid with black."

Yet the world must heed these daughters of sorrow - from the primal black All Mother of men down through the ghostly throng of mighty womanhood who walked in the mysterious dawn of Asia and Africa; from

Neith the primal black Mother of all,
Whose feet rest on hell
And whose almighty hands uphold the heavens;
All religion from Beauty and Beast lies on her eager breasts;
Her body bears the stars
While her shoulders are necklaced by the Dragon
From Ancient Neith down to
"That starr'd Ethiop queen that strove
To set her beauty's praise above
The sea nymphs,"

Through dusky Cleopatra, dark Candaces, and darker, fiercer Zinghas, to our own day and our own land, in gentle Phillis, Harriet the crude Moses, the sybil Sojourner Truth and the martyr, Louise De Mortie.

The father and his worship is Asia; Europe is the precocious self-centered forward-striving child. But the Land of the Mother is and was.

Africa. In subtle and mysterious way, despite her curious history, her slavery, polygamy and toil, the spell of the African mother prevades her land. Isis, the Mother, is still titular goddess in thought if not in name, of the dark continent. Nor does this all seem to be solely a survival of the historic matriarchate through which all nations pass--it appears to be more than this; as if the great black race in passing up the steps of human culture gave the world not only the Iron Age, the cultivation of the soil and domestication of animals, but also, in peculiar emphasis, the Mother-idea.

41-9-396

"No mother can love more tenderly, and none is more tenderly loved than the Negro mother" writes Schneider. Robin tells of the slave who bought his mother's freedom instead of his own. Mungo Park writes: "Everywhere in Africa, I have noticed that no greater affront can be offered a Negro than insulting his mother. 'Strike me,' cries a Mandingo to his enemy, 'but revile not my mother!" And the Krus and Fantis say the same. The peoples on Northern Zambezi and the great lakes cry, in sudden fear or joy: "O my mother'." And the Herero swears (Endless oath!) "By my mother's tears!" "As the mist in the seamps", cried the Angola Negro, "so lives the love of father and mother."

A student of the present Gold Coast life describes the work of the village headman, and adds:

"It is a difficult task that he is set to, but in this matter he has all-powerful helpers in the female membets of the family, who will be either the aunts, or the sisters, or the cousins, or the nieces of the headman; and as their interests are identical with his in every particular, the good women spontaneously train up their children to implicit obedience to the headman, whose rule in the family thus becomes a simple and an easy matter. 'The hand that rocks the cradle rules the world.' What a power for good in the Native State System Would the mothers of the Gold Coast and Ashanti become by judicious training upon native lines!"

Schweinfunth declares of one tribe: "a bond between mother and child which lasts for life, is the measure of affection shown among the Dyoor;" and Ratzel adds:

"Agreeably to the natural relation the mother stands first among the chief influences affecting the children. From the Zulus to the Waganda, we find the mother the most influential counsellor at the court of ferocious sovereigns like Chaka or Mtesa; sometimes sisters take her place. Thus even with chiefs who possess wives by hundreds the bonds of blood are the strongest, and the woman though often heavily burdened, is in herself in no small esteem among the Negroes is clear from the numerous Negro queens, from the medicine-woman, from the participation in public meetings permitted to women by many Negro peoples."

As I remember through memories of others, backward through my own family, it is the Mother I ever recall; the little far off mother of my grandmothers who sobbed her life away in song, longing for her lost palm-trees and scented waters; the tall and brozen grandmother, with beaked nose and shrewish eyes who loved and scolded her black and laughing husband as he smoked lazily in his high oak chair; above all my own mother with all her soft brownness - the brown velvet of her skin, the sorrowful black-brown of her eyes, and the tiny brown-capped waves of her midnight hair as it lay new parted on her forehead. All the way back in these dim distances it is mothers and mothers of mothers that seem to count and fathers are shadowy memories.

Upon this African Mother-idea, the westward slave trade and American slavery struck like doom: in the cruel exigencies of the traffic in men, and in the sudden unprepared emancipation, the great pendulum of social equilibrium swung from a time, in 1800, when America had but eight or less black women to every ten black men, all too swiftly to a day, in 1870, when there were nearly eleven women to ten men in our Negro population. This was but the outward numerical fact of social dislocation; within lay polygamy, polygandry, concubinage and moral degradation. They fought against all this desperately, did these black sla slaves in the West Indies, especially among the half free artisans; they set up their ancient household gods, and when Toussaint and Cristophe founded their kingdom in Hayti, it was based on old African tribal ties, beneath it the Mother-idea.

The crushing weight of slavery fell on black women: under it there was no legal marriage, no legal family, no legal control over children. To be sure custom and religion replaced here and there what the law denied, yet one has but to read advertisements like these to see the Hell beneath the system:

"$100 reward will be given for my two fellows, Abram and Frank. Abram has a wife at Colonel Stewart's in Liberty county, and a sister in Savannah at Capt. Govenstine's. Frank has a wife at Mr. LeCont's Liberty County; a mother at Thunderbolt, and a sister in Savannah.

- Wm. Roberts. Walthourville, 5th Jan. 1839

"$50 Reward - - Ran away from the subscriber, a negro girl named Maria. She is of a copper color, between 13 and 14 years of age - bareheaded and barefooted. She is small for her age - very sprightly and very likely. She stated she was going to see her mother at Maysville.

- Sanford Thomson

"$50 Reward - - Ran away from the subscriber, his negro man Pauladore, commonly call Paul. I understand Gen. R. Y. Hayne has purchased his wife and children from H. L. Pinckney, Esq., and has them now on his plantation at Goose Creek, where, no doubt, the fellow is frequently lurking.

- T. Davis

The Presbyterian Synod of Kentucky said to the churches under their care, in 1835:

41-9-399

"Brothers and sisters, parents and children, husbands and wives, are torn asunder, and permitted to see each other no more. These acts are daily occurring in the midst of us. The shrieks and agony often witnessed on such occasions proclaim, with a trumpet tongue, the iniquity of our system. There is not a neighborhood where these heart-rending scenes are not displayed. There is not a village or road that does not behold the sad procession of manacled outcasts, whose mournful countenances tell that they are exiled by force from all that their hearts hold dear".

A sister of a president of the United States declared:

"We Southern ladies are complimented with the names of wives; but we are only the mistresses of seraglios".

Out of this what sort of black woman could be born into the world of today? There are those who hasten to answer this query in writhing terms, and who say lightly and repeatedly that out of black slavery came nothing decent in womanhood; that adultery and uncleanness was their heritage and is their continued portion. It is a terrible charge - a charge humanly impossible of truth. The half million women of Negro descent who lived at the beginning of the 19th Century had become the mothers of two and one-fourth million daughters at the time of the Civil War and five million granddaughters in 1910. Can all these women be vile and the hunted race continue to grow in wealth and character? Impossible. Yet to save from the past the shreds and vestiges of self-respect has been a terrible task - I most sincerely doubt if any other race of women would have brought its fineness up through so devilish a fire. As the sainted Dr. Crummel once said of this his sister in the blood: "In her girlhood all the delicate tenderness of her sex has been rudely outraged. In the field, in the rude cabin, in the press-room, in the factory, she was thrown into the companionship of coarse and ignorant men. No chance was given her for delicate reserve or tender modesty. From her childhood she was the doomed victim of the grossest passion. All the virtues of her sex were utterly ignored. If the instinct of chastity asserted itself, then she had to fight like a tiger for the ownership and possession of her own person, and oftimes had to suffer pain and lacerations for her virtuous self-assertion. Whe she reached maturity all the tender instincts of her womanhood were ruthlessly violated. At the age of marriage - always prematurely anticipated under slavery - she was mated as the stock of the plantation were mated, not to be the companion of a loved and chosen husband, but to be the breeder of human cattle for the field or the auction block."

Down in such mire has the black motherhood of this race struggled - starving its own wailing offspring to nurse to the world their swaggering masters; welding for their children, chains which affronted even the moral sense of an unmoral world. Many a man and woman in the South have lived in wedlock as holy as Adam and Eve and brought forth their brown and golden children, but because the darker woman was helpless, her chivalrous and whiter mate could cast her off at his pleasure and publicly sneer at the body he had privately blasphemed.

I shall forgive the White South much in its final judgment day - I shall forgive it slavery, for slavery is a world-old habit; I shall forgive its fighting for a well-lost cause and remembrance of that struggle with tender tears; I shall forgive its so-called"pride of race", the passion of its hot blood, and even its dear old laughable strutting and posing; but one thing I shall not forgive, neither in this world nor the world to come, and that is its wanton an continued and persistent insulting of the black womanhood which it sought and seeks to prostitute to its lust. I cannot forget that it is such southern gentlemen into whose hands smug northern hypocrites of today are seeking to place our women's eternal destiny, men who insist on withholding from my mother and wife and daughter those signs and appellations of courtesy and respect which elsewhere he withholds only from bawds and courtesans.

The result of this history of insult and degradation has been both fearful and glorious: it has birthed the haunting prostitute, the brawler and the beast of burden; but it has also given the world an efficient womanhood whose strength lies in its freedom and whose chastity was won in the teeth of temptation and not in swaddling clothes.

To no modern race does its women mean so much as to us, nor come so near to the fulfillment of its meaning; as one of our women writes:

> "Only the black woman can say 'when and where I enter, in the quiet, undisputed dignity of my womanhood, without violence and without suing or special patronage, then and there the whole Negro race enters with me.'"

They come first in earlier days like foam flashes on dark, silent waters - bits of stern dark womanhood here and there tossed almost carelessly aloft to the world's notice. First and naturally they assumed the panoply of the ancient African Mother of Men - strong and black, whose very nature beat back the wilderness of oppression and contempt. Such an one was that cousin of my grandmother whom Western Massachusetts remembers as Mum Pett. Scarred for life by a blow received in defense of a sister she ran away to Great Barrington and was the first slave, or one of the first, to be declared free under the Bill of Rights of 1780. The Son of the judge that freed her, writes:

"Even in her humble station, she had, when occasion required it, an air of command which conferred a degree of dignity, and gave her an ascendency over those of her rank, which is very unusual in persons of any rank or color. Her determined and resolute character, which enabled her to limit the ravages of a Shay's mob, was manifested in her conduct and deportment during her whole life. She claimed no distinction; but it was yielded to her from her superior experience, energy, skill, and sagacity."

"Having known this woman as familarly as I knew either of my parents, I cannot believe in the moral or physical inferiority of the race to which she belonged. The degradation of the African must have been otherwise cause than by natural inferiority."

It was such strong women that laid the foundations of the great Negro church of today with its three and half million members and fifty-six millions of dollars in property. One of the early mothers of the church, Mary Still, writes thus quaintly, in the forties:

"When we were as castouts and spurned from the large churches, driven from our knees, pointed at by the proud, neglected by the careless, without a place of worship, Allen, faithful to the heavenly calling, came forward and laid the foundation of this connection. The women, like the women at the Sepulchre, were early to aid in laying the foundation of the temple, and in helping to carry up the noble structure, and in the name of their God, set up their banner; most of our aged mothers are gone from this to a better stateof things. Yet some linger still on their staves watching with intense interest the ark as it moves over the tempestuous waves of opposition and ignorance.*  But the labors of these women stopped not here, for they knew well that they were subject to affliction and death. For the purpose of mutual aid, they banded themselves together in society capacity, that they might be better able to admisnister to each others' sufferings, and to soften their own pillows. So we find the females in the early history of the church, abounded in good works, and in acts of true benevolence."

41-9-403

From such spiritual ancestry came two striking figures of war time- Harriet Tubman and Sojourner Truth.

For eight or ten years previous to the breaking out of the civil war, a constant attendant at anti-slavery conventions, lectures and other meetings, was a black woman of medium size, smiling countenance, with her upper front teeth gone, attired in coarse but neat clothes and carrying always an old fashioned reticule at her side. Usually as soon as she sat down she would drop off in sound sleep.

She was born a slave in Maryland in 1820, bore the marks of the lash on her flesh, and had been made partially deaf and perhaps to some degree mentally unbalanced by a blow on the head in childhood. Yet she was one of the most important agents of the Underground railroad and a leader of fugitive slaves. She ran away in 1849, and came to Boston in 1854, where she was welcomed into the homes of the leading abolitionists; and everyone listened with tense interest to her strange stories. She was absolutely illiterate with no knowledge of georgraphy, and yet year after year she penetrated the slave states and personally led North over 300 fugitives without losing a single one. A standing reward of $10,000 was offered for her, but as she said in her PATOIS: "The whites cannot catch me, for I was born with a charm, and the Lord has given me the power." She was one of John Brown's closest advisers and only severe sickness prevented her presence at Harper's Ferry.

When the War cloud broke she hastened to the front, flitting down along her own mysterious paths, haunting the armies in the field, and serving as guide and nurse and spy. She followed Sherman in his great march to the Sea and was with Grant at Petersburg, and always in the camps the Union officers silently saluted her.

The other woman belonged to a different type - a tall, gaunt, black unsmiling sybil, weighted with the Woe of the world. She ran away from slavery and giving up her own name took the name of Sojourner Truth. She says: "I can remember when I was a little young how my old mammy would sit out of doors in the evening and look up at the stars and groan, and I would say, Mammy, what makes you groan so? and she would say, 'I am groaning to think of my poor children; they do not know where I be and I don't know where they be. I look up at the stars and they look up at the stars.'"

Her determination was founded on unwavering faith in ultimate good. Wendell Phillips says that he was once in Faniel Hall, where Frederick Douglass was one of the chief speakers. Douglass had been describing the wrongs of the Colored race, and as he proceeded he grew more and more excited and finally ended by saying that they had no hope of justice from the Whites, no possible hope except in their own right arms. It must come to blood. They must fight for themselves. Sojourner Truth was sitting tall and dark on the very front seat facing the platform, and in the hush of feeling when Douglass sat down she spoke out in her deep peculiar voice, heard all over the house: "Frederick, is God dead?"

Such strong primitive types of Negro womanhood in America seem to some to exhaust its capabilities. They know less of a not more worthy but finer type of black woman wherein trembles all that delicate sense of beauty and striving for self-realization which is as characteristic of the Negro soul as is its quaint strength and sweet laughter. George Washington wrote in grave and gentle courtesy to a Negress in 1776 that he would "Be happy to see" at his headquarters at any time, a person "to whom nature has been so liberal and beneficent in her dispensations." This child, Phillis Wheatly, sang her grief and halting strain to a world that wondered and could not produce her like. Measured today her muse was slight and yet feeling her striving spirit we call to her still in her own words: "Through thickest glooms look back, Immortal shade." In the train of Phillis have other dark poets and singers.

Perhaps even higher than strength and art looms human sympathy and sacrifice as characteristic of Negro womanhood. Long years ago, before the Declaration of Independence, Kate Ferguson was born in New York. Freed, widowed and bereaved of her children before she was twenty, she took the children of the streets of New York, white and black, to her empty arms, taught them, found them homes; and with Dr. Mason of Murray Street Church, established the first modern Sunday school in Manhattan. Sixty years later came Mary Shadd up out of Delaware. She was tall and slim, of that ravishing dream-born beauty--that twilight of the races, which we call mulatto. Well-educated, vivacious, with determination shining from her sharp eyes, she threw herself singlehanded into the great Canadian pilgrimage when thousands of hunted black men hurried northward and crept beneath the protection of the Lion's paw. She became teacher, editor and lecturer, tramping afoot through winters snows, pushing without blot or blemish through crowd and turmoil to conventions and meetings, and finally becoming recruiting agent for the United States Government in gathering Negro soldiers in the West.

After the War, the sacrifice of Negro women for freedom and uplift is one of the finest chapters in their history, let one life typify all: Louise DeMortie, a free born Virginia girl, lived most her life in Boston. Her high forehead, swelling lips and dark eyes marked her for a woman of feeling and intellect. She began a successful career as a public reader. Then came the War and the call. She went to the orphaned colored children of New Orleans - out of freedom into insult and oppression, and in the teeth of yellow fever. She toiled and dreamed; in 1887 she had raised money and built an orphan home and that same year, in 34th year of her young life, she died, saying simply: "I belong to God."

As I look about me today in this veiled world of mine, despite the noiser and more spectacular advance of my brothers, I instinctively feel and know that it is the five million women of my race who really count; black women (and women whose grandmothers were black) are today furnishing our teachers; they are the main pillars of those social settlements which we call churches, and have with small doubt raised three-fourths of our church property. If we have today, as seems likely, over a billion dollars of accumulated goods, who shall say how much of it has been wrung from the hearts of servant girls and washerwomen, and women toilers in the fields? As makers of two million homes these women are today seeking in marvelous ways to show forth our strength and beauty and our conception of the truth.

In this land in 1910 there were 4,941,882 women of Negro descent: over twelve hundred thousand of these were children, another million were girls and young women under twenty and two and a half million were grown women. As a mass these women were unlettered,-a fourth of those from fifteen to twenty-five being unable to write. These women are passing through not only a moral, but an economic revolution. Their grandmothers married at twelve and fifteen, but twenty-seven per cent of these today who have passed fifteen are still single.

Yet these black women toil and toil hard. There were in 1910 two and a half million Negro homes in the land. Out of these walked daily two million women and girls over ten to work - over half the colored female population against a fifth in the care of white women. These then are a group of workers, fighting for their daily bread like men, independent, approaching economic freedom: they furnished a million farm laborers, 80,000 farmers, 22,000 teachers, 600,000 servants and washerwomen, and 50,000 in trades and merchandising. Subtracting the old and feeble, and we have probably not more than one and a half million.

The family group, however, which is the ideal of the culture with which these folk have been born is not based on the idea of an economically independent working mother. Rather its ideal harks back to the sheltered harem with the mother emerging at first as nurse and homemaker, while the man remains as sole breadwinner. What is the inevitable result? Broken families. Among natives whites, one woman in ten is separated from her husband by death, divorce or desertion. Among Negroes, the ratio is one in seven. Is the cause racial? No, it is economic, because there is the same high ratio among the white foreign born. The breaking up of the present family is the result of modern working and sex conditions and it hits the laborers with tenth force. The Negroes are put on a peculiarly difficult positions, because the wages of the male breadwinner is below standard white; the opening for colored women in certain lines of domestic work are many. Thus white toil holds the father and brother in country and town at low wages, high wages call the sisters and mothers to the city. As a result the Negro women out number the men 9 or 10 to 8 in many cities making what Charlotte Gilman bluntly call "cheap women".

What shall we say to this new economic equality in a great laboring class? Some, within and without the race deplore. Back to the homes with the women they cry and higher wage for the men. But how impossible this is and has been shown by the war conditions. Cessation of foreign migration has raised Negro mens'wages to be sure--but it has not only raised Negro womens' wages, but opened a score of men avenues of earning a living. Indeed here in microcosm and with differences emphasizing equality is the industrial history of labor in the 19th and 20th centuries. We cannot abolish the new economic freedom of women. We cannot imprison them again in a home or require them on pain or death and all be nurses and housekeepers.

Toward what we can do the black woman in America is leading.

It can be said without danger of contradiction that considering their poverty and lack of legal protection, nobody of modern women have maintain and achieved great fineness of life and strength of worthy purpose - and this too without taking into account the horror their past deliberate and forced degradation.

Not only this but today this group is developing a social leadership and a sense of deep social responsibility. A glance at their work is almost bewildering. They furnish two-thirds of our teachers, an overwhelming majority of our church workers and no small proportion of our business folk, and in addition they are the ones who, turning from the beaten paths of bread and butter and livelihood, have taken up definitely and successfully the inner burden of social reform. Their work takes the form of general charity, womens clubs, olk folks homes, orphanages, hospitals, Christian associations, literary and art clubs, day nurseries, settlements, kindergartens and civil reform.

Who are the leaders and moving spirits in this renaissance of womanhood among black folk? It would be perhaps unwise to single out living leaders by name. But seven unnamed ones I might select who typify the race today in its partially developed, wholly aspiring, splendidly sacrificial spirit: One, typifying the thrist for freedom, is among the clearest and most facile speakers of her sex in any land, a fearless champion in a crusade on two continents and an intrepid relentless breathless striver today. Another, typical of self-sacrifice, with her small smooth brownness, is the builder and sustainer of a great school and the loving clean unspotted type of perfect self-forgetfulness; a third, typical of brain power, is a brilliant sometimes even unscrupulous intellect of marvelous facility and unconquerable energy, who twists thousands in her fingers; a fourth,- white granddaughter of blacks - whose dramatic ability has held Boston spellbound with a complete rendition of Anthony and Cleopatra - and who took the Belasco gold medal at Sargent's, was offered one year a place in the New Theatre when death suddenly took her. She was, of course, white though black, and once (Laugh, ye Gods!) was offered the position of leading lady in the CLANSMAN! A fifth is one who led for years the 400 organized Negro women's clubs and through them the actige philanthropic rescue work among ten millions: a sixth is a young woman whose conceptions in clay brought the notice of Rodin, and the voice of a seventh was among the finest America has known but she is now singing to lead her own race to song. This is no dream nor fantasy- these are real black women orgranddaughters of black women of today. They mean something. Tomorrow they will mean more.

What is today the message of these black women to America and the world? The Uplift of Woman is, next to the Problem of the Color Line and the Peace Movement, the greatest modern cause. When now two of these movements - Woman and Color - combine in one, the combination has deep meaning.

In other years woman's way was clear: to be beautiful, to be petted, to bear children. Such is their theroretic destiny and if perchance they have been ugly, hurt, and barren, that has been forgotten with studied silence. In partial compensation for this narrowed destiny (perfectly suited to but few) the While World has lavished its politeness on its womankind - its chivalry and bows, its uncoverings, and courtesy - all the accumulated homage disused for courts and kings and craving exercise. The revolt of white women against this preordained destiny has in these latter days reached splendid proportions, but it is the revolt of an aristocracy of brains and ability - the middle class and rank and file still plod on in the appointed path, paid by the homage, the almost mocking homage of men.

From black women of America, however, (and from some others too, but chiefly from black women and their daughters' daughters,) this gauze has been withheld and without semblance of such apology they have been frankly trodden under the feet of men. They are and have been objected to, and objected to apparnetly for reasons peculiarly exasperating.

to reasoning beings. When in this world a man comes forward with a thought, a deed, a vision, we ask not, How does he look? but What is his message? It is of but passing interest that the messenger is beautiful or ugly--the message is the thing. This which is axiomatic among men has been in past ages but partially true if the messenger was a Woman. The world still wants to ask that a woman primarily be pretty and if she is not, the mob pouts and asks querulously: what else are women for? Now beauty "is its own excuse of being," but there are other excuses as most men know; and when the white world objects to black women bedause it does not consider them beautiful, the black world of right asks two questions: What is beauty? and Suppose you think them ugly, what then? If ugliness and unconventionality and eccentricity of face and deed does not bind men from doing the world's work and reaping the world's reward, why should it bind women?

Other things being equal all of us black and white, would prefer to be beautiful in face and form and suitably clothed; but most of us are not and one of the mightiest revolts of the century is against the devilish decree that no woman is a woman who is not by present standards a beautiful woman. This decree the black women of America have in large measure escaped from the first. Not being expected to be merely ornamental, they have girded themselves for work, instead of adorning their bodies simply for play. Their sturdier minds have concluded that if a woman be clean, healthy and educated, she is as pleasing as God wills, and far more useful than most of her sisters. If in addition to this she be pink and white and straight-haired, and her fellow men prefer this, well and good; but if she be black and brown and crowned in curled mists, this is surely the flimmiest excuse for spiritual incarceration or banishment. The very attempt to do this in the case of Negro Americans has strangely overreached itself. By so much as the defective eyesight of the white world rejects black women as beauties, by so much the more it needs them as human beings - an enviable alternative as many a white woman knows. Consequently for black women alone as a group, "handsome is that handsome does," and they are asked to be no more beautiful than God made them, but they are asked to be efficient, to be strong, fertile, muscled and able to work. If they marry they must as independent workers be able to help support their children; for their men are paid on a scale that makes sole support of the family impossible. On the whole colored working women are paid as well as whites for similar work, save in some higher grades, while colored men get from one-fourth to three-fourths less than white men. The result is curious and three-fold: the economic independence of black women is increased, the breaking up of Negro families must be more frequent and the number of illegitimate children decreases more slowly among them than other evidences of culture increase, just as was once true in Scotland and Bavaria.

What does this mean? It forecast a mighty dilemma which the world of civilization, despite its will, must one time frankly face: the unhusbanded mother or the childless wife. God send us a world with woman's freedom and married motherhood inextricably wed, but unlike He sends it, I see more of future promise in the betrayed girl-mothers of the Black Belt than in the childless wives of the North; and I have more respect for the colored servant who yields to her frank longing for motherhood than for her whiter sister who offers up children for clothes. Out of a sex freedom that today makes us shudder will come in time a day when we will no longer pay men for work they do not do for the sake of their harem; we will pay women what they earn and insist on their working and earning it; we will allow those to vote who know enough whether they be black or female, white or male, and we will ward race suicide not by further burdening the over-burdened, but by honoring motherhood even when the sneaking father shirks his duty.

"Wait till the lady passes, "said a Nashville white boy
"She's no lady - she's a nigger, " answered another;

So somefew women are born free and some amid insult and scarlet letters achieve freedom, but our women in black had freedom thrust contemptuously upon them. With that freedom they are buying an unramelled independence; and dear as the price they pay for it, it will in the end be worth every taunt and groan. Today the dreams of the mothers are coming true. We have still our poverty and degradation, our lewdness and our cruel toil; but we have too a vast group of women of Negro blood who for strength of character, cleanness of soul and unselfish devotion of purpose, is today, easily the peer of any group in the civilized world. And more than that, in the great rank and file of our five million women we have the up-working of new revolutionary ideals which must in time have vast influence on the thought and action of this land. For this, their promise and for their hard past I honor the women of my race - their beauty, their dark and mysterious beauty of midnight eyes, crumpled hair, and soft full-featured faces, is perhaps more to me than to you because I was born to its warmth and subtle spell; but their worth is yours as well as mine. No other women on earth could have emerged from the Hell of force and temptation that once engulfed and still surrounds black women in America with half the modesty and womanliness that they retain. I have always felt like bowing myself before them in all abasement searching to bring some tribute to these long suffering victims, these burdened sisters of mine , whom the world, the wise white world loves to affront and ridicule and wantonly to insult. I have known the women of many lands and nations - know and seen and lived beside them, but none have I known more sweetly feminine, more unswervingly loyal, more desperately earnest and more instinctively pure in body and in soul than the daughters of my black mothers. This then - a little thing - to their memory, and inspiration.

forward to lift the conductor's baton. It was one of the earliest renditions of "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast." We sat at rapt attention and when the last, wierd music died, the great chorus and orchestra rose as a man to acclaim the master; he turned toward the audience and then we turning for the first time saw that sea of faces behind, - the misty thousands whose voices rose to one strong shout of joy! It was a moment such as one does not often live. It seemed, and was, prophetic.

This young man, who ~~in those days~~ stepped forth as one of the most notable of modern English composers, had a simple and uneventful career. His father was a black surgeon of Sierra Leone who came to London ~~for~~ study. While there he met an English girl and this son was born, in London, in 1875.

31-11-49

Then came a series of changes. His father failed & succeed and disheartened back to Africa, leaving the child & a hard working mother. The child of ~~four~~ showed endences of musical talent and a ~~friend~~ friendly ~~neighbour~~ gave him a little violin. A musician glancing from his window saw a little dark boy playing marbles on the steps, with a tiny violin in one hand; he gave him lessons. He hardened & gave entrance into a choir-day school with a master of understanding mind to the recognised genius when he came & At last finally his beautiful child's treble brought at last To the notice of the Choir master of St Georges, Croyden. So! by sudden accident his way was clear. Within his soul was no hesitation.

Ltr

~~The boy~~ one was of those fortunate beings who are not called to wanderjahre, but are born with sails set and seas charted. Already the baby of four ~~little~~ years was a musician, and as choir-boy and violinist, he walked unhesitatingly and surely to his life work. He was graduated with honors from the Royal Academy of Music in 1894 and married soon after the daughter of one of his professors. Then his life began and whatever it lacked of physical adventure in the conventional round of a modern world-city, it more than gained in the almost tempestuous outpouring of his spiritual nature. Life to him was neither meat nor drink,- it was creative flame; ideas, plans, melodies, glowed within him. To create, to do, to accomplish- to know the white glory of mighty midnights and the pale Amen of dawns was his day of days. Songs, piano-forte and violin pieces, trios and quintets for strings, incidental music, symphony, orchestral, and choral works, rushed from his fingers. Nor were they laboriously contrived or light, thin things made to meet sudden popularity. Rather they were the flaming bits that must be said and sung,- that could not wait the slower birth of years, but so hurried to the world as though their young creator knew that God gave him but a day. His whole active life was scarcely more than a decade

to education when, in fact, being born is being given a right to college training. Our wealth today is, we all know, distributed mainly by chance inheritance and personal favor and yet we attempt to base the right to education on this foundation. The result is grotesque. We bury genius; ~~We~~ send it to jail; ~~We~~ ridicule and mock it, ~~and~~ while we send mediocrity and idiocy to college, gilded and crowned. For ~~a~~ three hundred years we have denied black ~~folk~~ americans an education and now we exploit them ~~to a graping~~ before ~~the~~ a gaping world: See how ignorant and degraded they are! All they are fit for is education for cotton-picking and dish-washing. When Dunbar and Taylor happen along, we ~~cough and forget.~~ are torn between something like shamefaced anger or impatient amazement.

A world guilty of this last and mightiest war has no right to enjoy or create until it has made the future safe from another Louvain or Rheims. No this There is but one patent way, proved and inescapable, ~~immortality~~ and Education and that ~~lies in the hands of~~ not for me or for you but for the Immortal Child. And that child is of all races and all colors. All children are the Children of All and not of individuals and families and races The whole generation must be trained and guided and and eyed as and of a huge reservoir must be tested all genius, talent and intelligence & saved all the saved.

VII My friend who is pale and positive said to me yesterday as the tired sun was nodding:

"You are to sensitive. I admit, I am -- sensitive. I am artificialcial, and cringe or am bumptious or immobile. I am intellectually dishonest, art blind and I lack humor.

"Why don't you stop all this "she retorts triumphant, You will not let us.

Wait! I answer, Wait.

I arise at seven. The milkman has neglected me. He pays little attention to colored districts. My white neighbor glares elaborately. I walk softly but I disturb him. The children jeer as I pass to work. The women in the street car withdraw their skirts or prefer to stand. The policemen are truculent. The elevator man hates to serve Negroes. My job is unsecure becasuse the white union wants it and does not want me. I try to lunch but no place near will serve me. I go forty blocks to Marshall's but the Committee of Fourteen closes Marshall's. They say white women frequent it.

"Do all eating discriminate? No, but how shall I know which do not - except - I hurry home through crowds. They mutter or get angry, and I go to Mass meeting. They stare. I go to a Theatre. "We don't admit niggers!"

Or perhaps I leave the beaten track. I seek new work. "Our employees would not work with you", "or customers would object", and ask to help in social uplift.

Why - er - we will write to you", and enter the free field of science. Every laboratory door is closed and no endowments are available. I seek the Universal Mistress, Art--the studio door is locked. I write Literature, "We cannot publish stories of Colored folks of that type" -- its the only type I know. This is my life. It makes me idiotic; it gives me artificial problems. I hesitate, I rush, I waver, I'm fine -- I am sensitive.

My pale friend looks at me with disbelief and curly tongue. Do you mean to sit and tell me that this is what happens to you each day? "Certainly not" I answer low. Then you only fear it will happen - I fear.

Well, haven't you the courage to rise above a - almost a craven fear. Quite - Quite craven is my Fear, I admit; but the terrible thing is - these things do happen. "But you just said" -- They do happen. Not all each day -- surely not. But now and then - now seldom now, sudden; now after a week now in a chain of awful minutes, not everywhere, but anywhere in Boston in Atlanta. That's the Hell of it. Imagine spending your life looking for insults or for hiding places from them -- shrinking (instinc-ively and despite desperate bolsterings of courage) from blows that are not always but ever; not each day but each week, each month, each year, just perhaps as you have choked back the craven fear and cried "I am and will be the Master of my -----

"No more tickets down stairs -- here's one to the smoking gallery". You hesitate. You beat back your suspicions.

After all a cigarette with Charlie Chaplin -- then a Man pushes by -- "three in the Orchestra" -- "yes six" and in he goes. Suddenly your eye sees red. You turn yourself away toward the golden twinkle of the purple night and hesitate again. What's the use? Why not always yield - always take what's offered - always bow to Force, whether of cannons or dislike. Then the great Fear sings in your soul - the real fear - the fear beside which other fears are vain imaginings - the Fear less regret there and then you are losing your own soul. That you are losing your own Soul and the sould of a people; that millions of unborn children, black and gold and mauve are being there and then despoiled by you because you are a coward and done not fright. Suddenly that silly orchestra seat and the cavalry of a comedian with funny feet become matters of life, death and immortality; you grip the pillars of the universe and strain as you sway back to that beautiful ticket girl. You grip your soul for not and murder. You choke and sputter and she seeing that you are about to make a "fuss" obeys her orders and throws the tickets at you in contempt. Then you slink to your seat and crouch in the darkness before the film with every . The miserable wave of reaction engulfs you. To think of compelling puppies to take your hard earned money; fattening boys to hold you and yours; forcing your way among cheap and tawdry idiots --

God! What a night of pleasure!

V 11 Here then is Beauty and Ugliness; wide vision of world sacrifice, a little gleam of world hate. Which is life and what is death and how shall we face so tantalizing contradiction. Any explanation must be necessarily subtle and invalid. No pert and easy word of encouragement, no nearby dark despair can lay hold of the roots of these things. And first and before all we cannot forget that this World is beautiful. Grant all its ugliness and sin - the petty horrible snarl of its putried threads which few have seen more near or more often than I -- notwithstanding all this the beauty of this world is not to be denied.

31-4-6

Casting my eyes about I dare not let them rest on the beauty of Love and Friend, for even if my tongue were cunning enough to sing this or the revelation of reality here is too sacred and the fancies in untrue. Of one world Beauty alone may one be brutally frank -- and though the least of beauties it is divine.

There mountains hurl themselves against the stars and at their feet large black and leaden seas. Above float clouds - white grey and inken and about the clear impalpable air springs and sparkles like new wine. Last night we floated on the calm bosom of the sea in the southernmost haven of Mount Decent. The water flamed and sparkled. The sun had gone but above the crooked back of cumulus clouds, dark and pink with radiance and on the other sky aloft to the eastward field the gorgeous curtained mists of evening. The raidance faded and a shadowy velvet mist veiled the mountains, a humid depth of gloom behind which lacked all mysteries of life and death

While above the clouds hung ashen and dull. Lights twinkled and flashed along the shore, boats glided in the twilight and the little puffing of motors droned away. Thennwas the hour to talk of life and the meaning of life, while above gleamed silently, suddenly, star on star.

Bar Harbor lies beneath a mighty mountain, a great bare black mountain that sleeps above the town but as you leave rises suddenly, threatenly unto far away or Frenchman's bay; its looms above the town in vastness as if to call all that little world petty save itself. Beneath the coolwwide stave of that great mountain men cannot live as giddily as in some lesser cummer's play ground. Before the unveiled face of nation as it lies naked on the Maine coast rises a certain human awe.

God molded his world largely and mightily off the marvelous coast and meant that in the tired days of life men should come and worship here a and renew their spirit. This I have done and turning I go to work again. As we go ever the mountains of Mount Desert rise and greet us on our going- sombre rock and silent, looking unmoved on the moving world, yet conscious of their everlasting strength.

About us beats the sea - the coil fleshed restless sea. Huming its tune about am pyhsical unmindful of the voices of men. The land sinks to meadows, black pine forests with here and there a blue and mistful mountain. Then there are instants, bold rocks above the sea, curled meadows; through and about them roll ships, weather-beaten and patched of sail, strong hulled and smoky, light gay and shining, all the colors of the sea lie about us - gray and yellowing greens and doubtful blues, blacks not quite black and tinted silvers and golds, and dreaming whites. Long tongues of dark and golden land list far out into the towing waters and the white gulls sail and scream above them. It is a mighty coast - ground out and pounded, scarred, crushed and carven in massive frightful lineaments everywhere shout the pines--the littledark and faries, that smile not neither week, and wait and wait. Near us lie isles of flesh and bblood, white cottages, tilled and meadowed. Afar lie shadow lands high mist hidden hills, mountains boldly mined--yet shady to the sky, faint and unreal.

We skirt the fine clad shores, chary of men and know how bitterly winter kisses these lonely shores to fill yon row of beaked ice houses that creep up the hills. We are sailing due westward and the sun, yet two hours high is blowing a fiery glowing on the sea, that shreads and gleams like some broad jewelled trail, to where the blue and distant shadow loud lifts its craven front aloft, leaning as it gropes, shades of shadows beyond.

Why do not thou whose are scamed in the world's battle and hurt by its hardness travel to these places of beauty and drown themselves in other joy of life. I asked this once sitting in a southern home. Outside the spring of a Georgia February was luring gold to the bushes and languor to the soft air. Around me sat color in human flesh - brown that crimsoned readily; dim soft yellows that escaped description, cream-like dusKiness that shadowed to rich tints of autumn leaves. And yet a suggested journey in the world brought no response. "I should think you would like to travel" said the White One. But no, the thought of a journey seemed to depress them. It is this way they said, sheaping now successively now at once.

The cry for service as high as heaven , as wide as human feeling seemed filling the earth. What mere petty stights, silly insults, falling problems beside this call to do and dare and die. We offered our services to fight. What happened? Most Americans have forgotten the extraordinary series of events which worked the feelings of black America to fever heat.

First was the refusal to accept Negro volunteers for the army except in the four black regiments already established. While the nation was combing the country for volunteers for the regular army it would not let the American Negro furnish even his proportionate quota of regular soldiers. This led to some grim bantering among Negroes:

himself while the commander frantically telepraphed to Washington. Small wonder that one poor fellow in Ohio solved the problem by cutting his throat. The whole process of drafting Negroes had to be held up until the government could find methods and places for assembling them.

~~On the top of this~~ Then came Houston. In a moment the nation forgot the whole record of one of the most celebrated regiments in the U.S. Army and their splendid service in the Indian Wars and in the Philippines. It was the first regiment mobilized in the Spanish-American War and it was the regiment ~~that~~ who volunteered to a man to clean up the yellow fever camps when others hesitated. It was one of the regiments to which Pershing said in December :

"Men, I am authorized by Congress to tell you all that our people back in the States are mightily glad and proud at the way the soldiers have conducted themselves while in Mexico, and I, General Pershing, can say with pride that a finer body of men never stood under the flag of our nation than we find here tonight."

The nation, also, forgot the deep resentment mixed with the pale ghost of fear which Negro soldiers call up in the breasts of the white South. It is not so much that they fear that the Negro will strike if he gets a chance, but rather that they assume with curious unanimity that he has REASON to strike, that any other persons in his circumstances or treated as he is would rebel. Instead of seeking to relieve the cause of such a possible feeling, most of them strain every effort to bottle up the black man's resentment. Is it inconceivable that now and then it bursts all bounds, as at Brownsville and Houston?

So in the midst of this mental turmoil came Houston and East St. Louis. At Houston black soldiers, goaded and insulted, suddenly went wild and "shot up" the town. At East St. Louis white strikers on war work killed and mobbed Negro workingmen, ~~And here are the results.~~ and as a result 19 colored soldiers were hanged & fifty one imprisoned for life for killing 17 whites at Houston while for killing 125 Negroes in E. St. Louis 20 white men were imprisoned, none for more than 3 years & 10 colored men were hanged

Once upon a time I took a great journey in this land to three of the ends of our world and over seven thousand mighty miles. I saw the grim desert and the high rampart of the Rocky Mountains. Three days I flew from the silver beauty of Seattle, to the sombre whirl of Kansas City. Three days I flew from the brute might of Chicago to the air of the Angels, in California, scented with golden flowers, where the homes of men crouch low and loving on the good, broad earth, as though they were kissing ~~its~~ her blossoms. Three days I flew through the empire of Texas,- but all these shall be tales untold, for in all this journey I saw but one thing that lived and will live eternal in my soul,-the Grand Canon.

It is a sudden void in the bosom of earth, down to its entrails,- a wound where the dull titanic knife has turned and twisted in the hole, leaving its edges livid, scarred, jagged, and pulsing, over the white and red and purple of its mighty flesh, while down below-down, down below, in black and severed vein, boils the dull and sullen flood of the Colorado.

It is awful! There can be nothing like it. It is the earth and sky gone stark and raving mad. The mountains uptwirled, disbodied and mroning when the thunders of hell called the Ninety-second to its last great drive. Memories of bitter humiliations, determined triumphs, great victories and bugle-calls that sounded from earth to heaven. Like memories framed in the breath of God, my audience peered in upon me--good, brown faces with great, kind, beautiful eyes--black soldiers of America rescuing beloved France--and the words came in praise and benediction there in the "Y", with its little stock of cigarettes and candies and its rusty wood stove.

"Alors," said Madame, "quatres sont morts"--four dead--four tall, strong sons dead for France--sons like the sweet and blue-eyed daughter who was hiding her brave smile in the dusk. It was a tiny stone house whose front window lipped the passing side walk where ever tramped the feet of black soldiers marching home. There was a cavernous wardrobe, a great fireplace invaded by a new and jaunty iron stove. Vast, thick piles of bed rose in yonder corner. Without was the crowded kitchen and up a half-stair was our bedroom that gave upon a tiny court with arched stone staircase and green tree. We were a touching family party held together by a great sorrow and a great joy. How we laughed over the salad that got brandy instead of vinegar--how we ate the great golden pile of fried potatoes and how we poured over the post-card from the Lieutenant of the Senegalese--dear little vale of crushed and risen France, in the day when Negroes went "over the top" at Pont-a-Mousson.

Paris, Paris by purple facade of the opera, the crowd on the Boulevard des Italiens and the great swing of the Champs Elysees. But not the Paris the world knows. Paris with its soul cut to the core--feverish, crowded, nervous, hurried; full of uniforms and mourning bands, with cafes closed at 9:30--no sugar, scarce bread, and tears so interwined with joy that there is scant difference. Paris has been dreaming a nightmare and though she awakes, the grim terror is upon her--it lies on the sandclosed art treasures of the Louvre. Only the flowers are there, always the flowers, the Roses of England and the Lillies of France.

New York! Behind the Liberty that faces free France rise the white cliffs of Manhattan tier on tier with a curving penacle, towers square and twin, a giant inkwelldainerly stopped an ancient pyramid enthroned; beneath low ramparts wide and mighty, while above faint-limned against the turbulent sky, looms the vast grace of that Cathedral of the Purehand and Purchasing Poor, topping the world and pointing higher.

Yonder the grey cobwebs of the Brooklyn bridges leap the sea and here creep the argosies from all earth's ends. We move to this swift home on dunn and smelling waters and hear as we come the heart beats of the new world.

New York and right from the Brooklyn bridge: The bees and fireflies flit and twinkled in their vast hives, curved clouds like the breath of God's power between the towers and the moon. One hears the hiss of lightenings, the deep thunder of human things and a fevered breathing as of some attendant of invincible Powers. The glow of burning millions melts outward into dim and faring outlines until afar the liquid born of rusty crowds falls like a benediction on the sea.

31-11-94

New York and morning: the sun is kissing the timid dew in Central Park and from the Fountain of Plenty one looks along that world Street, Fifth Avenue and walks toward town. The earth lifts and curves graciously down from the older mansions of princes to the newer shops of luxury. Egypt and Absynia, Paris and Damascus, London and India caress you by the way, churches stand aloof while the shopsswell to emporiums. But all this is nothing. Everything is mankind. Humanity stands and flies and walks and rolls about --the poor, the priceless, the world-known and the forgotten, child and grandfather, king and leman--the pageant of the world goes by set in a frame of stone and jewels, clothed in scarlet and rags. Princes street and the Elysian Fields, the Strand and the hingstrasse--these are the Ways of the World today.

New York and twilight, there where the Sixth Avenue rises and leaps above the tenements with the free air at 110 th St. It circles like a bird with heaven and St. Johns above and earth and the sweet green and gold of the park beneath. Beyond lies all the blue mists and mysteries of distance, beneath the city rushes and crawls. Behind echoes all the roar and war and cares and mare of the wide city set in its sullen darkening walls, flashing wierd and crimson farewells. Out at the sides the stars twinkle.

Again New York and Night and Harlem. A dark city of fifty thousand rises like magic from the earth, gone is the white world, the pale lips, the limp hand; gone is the West and North--the East and South is here triumphant. The street is crowded and leisure and laughter. Everywhere black eyes, black and brown, and frizzled hair curled and slick, and skins that riot with luscious color and deep burning blood. Humanity is packed dense in high files of close knit homes that lie in layers above gray shops of food and clothes and drink, with here and there a moving picture show. Orators declair on the corners, lovers lark in the streets, gamblers glide by the licquor saloons, workers lounge wearily home. Children scream and run and frolic and all is good and human and beautiful and ugly and evil even as life is elsewhere.

And then--the Veil. It drops as drops the night on southern seas, vast, sudden, unanswering. There is Hate behind it and Cruelty and Tears. As one peers through its intircate infathonable pattern of ancient, old old designs one sees blood and guilt and ruins--understanding. And yet it hangs then, this veil, betwe n then and now, between Pale and Colored, and Black andWhite. Surely it is a thought--thing, tenuons, intangible yet just as surely is true and terrible and not in our little day may you and I lift it. We may feverishly unravel its edges and even climb slow with giant shears to where its ringed and gilded top nestles close to the throne of America's God. But as we work and climb we shall see through streaming eyes and hear with aching ears lynching and murder, cheating and despising, degrading and lying so flashed and flecked through this vast hanging and the meaning of life, while above gleamed silently, suddenly, star on star.

Bar Harbor lies beneath a mighty mountain, a great, bare, black mountain that sleeps above the town, but as you leave it rises suddenly, threatening, until far away on Frenchman's Bay its looms above the town in withering vastness, as if to call all that ~~little~~ world petty save itself. Beneath the cool, wide stare of that great mountain men cannot live as giddily as in some lesser summer's play-ground. Before the unveiled face of nature, as it lies naked on the Maine coast, rises a certain human awe.

God moulded this world largely and mightily off this marvelous coast and meant that in the tired days of life men should come and worship here and renew their spirit. This I have done, and returning I go to work again. As we go over, the mountains of Mount Desert rise and greet us on the moving world, ~~yet~~ as if conscious of their everlasting strength.

About us beats the sea - the sail-flecked, restless sea, humming its tune about our flying keel, unmindful of the voices of men. The land sinks to meadows, black pine forests, with here and there a blue and mistful mountain. Then there are islands - bold rocks above the sea, curled meadows; through and about them roll ships, weather-beaten and patched of sail, strong-hulled and smoking, light gray and shining. All the colors of the sea lie about us - gray and yellowing greens and doubtful blues, blacks not quite black, tinted silvers and golds and dreaming whites. Long tongues of dark and golden land lick far out into the tossing waters, and the white gulls sail and scream above them. It is a mighty coast - ground out and pounded, scarred, crushed, and carven in massive, frightful lineaments. Everywhere stand the pines - the little dark and steadfast pines that smile not, neither weep, but wait and wait. Near us lie isles of flesh and blood, white cottages, tiled and meadowed. Afar lie shadow-lands, high mist hidden hills, mountains boldly limned, yet shading to the sky, faint and unreal.

We skirt the pine-clad shores, chary of men, and ~~know~~ imagine how bitterly winter kisses these lonely shores to fill yon row of beaked ice houses ~~that~~ which

There is something in the nature of beauty that demands an end. Ugliness may be indefinite. It may trail off into gray, ~~incefinite~~ endlessness. But beauty must be complete - whether it be a field of poppies or a great life, - it must end, and the End is part and triumph of the Beauty. I know there are those who envisage a beauty eternal. But I can not. I can dream of great and never-ending procession of beautiful things and visions and acts. But each must be complete or it cannot for me exist.

On the other hand, ugliness to me is eternal; but its eternity not be in its essence but in its incompleteness does not daunt me, for its eternal unfulfilment is a cause of joy. There is in it nothing new or unexpected; it is the old evil stretching out; and ever seeking for and it cannot find ~~it cannot be worse~~; it may coil and writhe and recur in endless battle to days without end, but it is the same human ill and bitter hurt. But beauty is fulfilment. It satisfies. It is always new & change It is the reasonable thing. Its end is Death - the sweet silence of perfection, the calm and balance of utter music. Therein is the triumph of beauty

"Why do you waht to volunteer?" asked many. "Why should you fight for this country?"

Before we had chance to reply to this there came the army draft bill and the proposal by Vardaman and his ilk to except Negroes. We protested to Washington in various ways and while we were insisting that colored men should be drafted just as other citizens the bill went through with two little "jokers."

First, it provided that Negroes should be drafted but trained in "separate" units and, secondly, it somewhat ambiguously permitted men to be drafted for "labor."

A wave fo fear and unrest spread among Negroes; and while we were looking at both these provisions askance suddenly we received the draft registration blank. It directed persons "of African descent" to"tear off the corner."! Probably never before in the history of the United States has a portion of the citizens been so openly and crassly discriminated against by action of the general government. It was disheartening and on top of it came the celebrated "German plots." It was alleged in various parts of the country with singular unanimity that Germans were working among the Negroes and it was further initmated that this would make the Negores too dangerous and element to trust with guns. To us, of course, it looked as though the discovery and the proposition came from the same thinly-veiled sources.

Considering carefully these series of happenings the Ameridan Negro sensed an approaching crisis and faced a puzzling dilemma. Here was evidently preparing fertile ground for the spread of disloyalty and resentment among the black masses as they were forced to choose apparently between forced labor or a "Jim Crow" draft. Manifestly when a minority group is thus segregated and forced out of the nation they can in reason do but one thing - take advan tage of the disadvantage.

In this case we asked for colored officers for the colored troops.

General Wood was early approached and asked to admit suitable candidates to Plattsburg. He refused. We thereupon pressed the government for a "separate" camp for the training of Negro officers. Not only did the War Department hesitate at this request but strong opposition arose among colored people themselves. They said this really was going too far. WWe will obey the law but to ask for voluntary segregation is to insult ourselves." But strong, sober second thought came to rescue. We said to our protesting brothers: "We face a condition, not a theory. There is not the slightest chance of our being admitted to white camps, therefore, it is either a case of a "Jim Crow" officers training camp or no colored officers. Of the two things no colored officers would be the greatest calamity."

Thus we gradually made up our minds. But the War Department still hesitated. It was besieged and when it presented its final argument, "We have no place for such a camp," the trustees of Howard University said: "Take our campus." Eventually twelve hundred colored cadets were assembled at Fort Des Moines for training.

The city Des Moines promptly protested but it finally changed its mind. The city never before had seen such a class of colored men. They rapidly became popular with all classes and many encomiums were passed upon their conduct. Their commanding colonel pronpunced their work first class and declared that they presented excellent material for officers.

Meantime, with one accord, the thought fo the colored people turned toward Colonel Young, their highest officer in the regular army.

Charles Young is an heroic figure. He is the typical soldier, - silent, uncomplaining, brave and efficient. From his days at West Point throughout his twenty-eight years of service he has taken whatever task was assigned him and performed it efficiently and there is no doubt but that the army has been almost merciless in the requirements which it has put upon this splendid officer. He came through all with flying colors. In Haiti, in Liberia, in Western camps, in the Sequoia Forests of California, and finally with Pershing in Mexico, - in every case he triumphed. Just at the time we were looking to the Government to call him to head the colored officers training at Des Moines, he was retired from the Army, because of "high blood pressure!" There is no disputing army surgeons and their judgment in this case may be justified, but coming at the time it did, nearlyy every Negro in the United States believed that the "high blood pressure" that retired Colonel Young was in the prejudiced heads of the southern oligarchy who were determined that no Negro should ever wear the stars of a General.

To say that Negroes of the United States were disheartened at the retirement of Colonel Young is to put it mildly; but there was more trouble. The provision that Negroes must be trained separately looked simple and was simple in places where there were large Negro contingents; but in the North with solitary Negroes drafted here and there we had some extraordinary developments. Regiments appeared with one Negro where the Negro had to be separated like a pest and put in a house or even a village by himself, while the Commander frantically telegraphed to Washington. Small wonder that one poor fellow in Ohio solved the problem by cutting his throat. The whole process of drafting Negroes had to be held up until the Government could find methods and places for assembling them.

On the tope of this came Houston. In a moment the nation forgot the whole record of one of the most celebrated regiments in the U. S. Army and their splendid service in the Indian Wars and in the Philippines. It was the first regiment mobilized in the Spanish American War and it was the regiment that volunteered to a man to clean up the yellow fever camps when others hesitated. It was one of the regiments to which Pershing said in December:

"Men, I am authorized by Congress to tell you all that our people back in the States are mighty glad and proud at the way the soldiers have conducted themselves while in Mexico, and I, General Pershing, can say with pride that a finer body of men never stood under the flag of our nation than we find here tonight."

The nation also forgot the deep resentment mixed with the pale ghost of fear which Negro soldiers call up in the breasts of the white South. It is not so much that they fear that the Negro will strike if he gets a chance, but rather that they assume with curious unanimity that he has REASON to strike; that any other persons in his circumstances or treated as he is would rebel. Instead of seeking to relieve the cause of such a possible feeling, most of them strain every effort to bottle up the black man's resentment. Is it conceivable that now and then it bursts all bounds, as at Brownsville and Houston?

So, in the midst of this mental turmoil came Houston and East St. Louis. At Houston, black soldiers goaded and insulted suddenly went wild and "shot up" the town. At East St. Louis, white strikers on war work killed and mobbed Negro workingmen. And this is the result:

HOUSTON	EAST ST. LOUIS
Offense	Offense
17 white persons killed	125 Negroes killed

19 colored soldiers hanged	9 white men imprisoned 5 - 15 years

11 white men imprisoned 1 year

18 white men fined

10 colored men imprisoned 14 years

The cry for service as high as heaven, as wide as human feeling seemed filling the earth. What were petty slights, silly insults, falling problems beside this call to do and dare and die. We offered our service to fight. What happened? Most Americans have forgotten the extraordinary series of events which worked the feelings of black America to fever heat.

First was the refusal to accept Negro volunteers for the army except in the four black regiments already established. While the nation was combing the country for volunteers for the regular army it would not let the American Negro furnish even his proportionate quota of regular soldiers. This led to some grim bantering among Negroes:

Before we had chance to reply to this there came the army draft bill and the proposal by Vardaman and his ilk to except Negroes. We protested to Washington in various ways and while we were insisting that colored men should be drafted just as other citizens the bill went through with two little "jokers."

THE PRAYERS OF GOD

Name of God's Name!
Red murder reigns;
All hell is loose;
On gold autumnal air
Walk grinning devils, barbed and hoofed;
While high on hills of hate,
Black-blossomed, crimson-sky'd,
Thou sittest, dumb.

Father Almighty!
This earth is mad!
Palsied, our cunning hands;
Rotten, our gold;
Our argosies reel and stagger
Over empty seas;
All the long aisles
Of thy Great Temples, God,
Stink with the entrails
Of our souls,
And Thou art dumb.

Above the thunder of Thy Thunders, Lord,
Lightening Thy Lightnings,
Rings and roars
The dark damnation
Of this hell of war,
Red piles the pulp of hearts and heads
And little children's hands.

Allah!
Elohim!
Very God of God!
Death is here!

Dead are the living; deep-dead the dead.
Dying are earth's unborn--
The babes' wide eyes of genius and of joy,
Poems and prayers, sun-glows and earth-songs,
Great-pictured dreams,
Unmarbled phantasies,
High hymning heavens--all
In this dread night
Writhe and shriek and choke and die
This long ghost-night--
While Thou art dumb.

Have mercy!
Have mercy upon us, miserable sinners!
Stand forth, unveil Thy Face,
Pour down the light
That seethes above Thy Throne,
And blaze this devil's dance to darkness!
Hear!
Speak!
In Christ's Great Name--

40 10 18

I hear!
Forgive me, God!
Above the thunder I hearkened;
Beneath the silence, now,--
I hear!

(Wait, God, a little space.
It is so strange to talk with Thee-- Alone!)

This gold?
I took it.
Is it Thine?
Forgive; I did not know.

Blood? Is it wet with blood?
'Tis from my brother's hands.
(I know; his hands are mine.)
It flowed for Thee, O Lord.

War? Not so; not war--
Dominion, Lord, and over black, not white;
Black, brown, and fawn,
And not Thy Chosen Brood, O God,
We murdered.
To build Thy Kingdom,
To drape our wives and little ones,
And set their souls a-glitter--
For this we killed these lesser breeds
And civilized their dead,
Raping red rubber, diamonds, cocoa, gold!

For this, too, once, and in Thy Name,
I lynched a Nigger--

(He raved and writhed,
I heard him cry,
I felt the life-light leap and lie,
I saw him crackle there, on high,
I watched him wither!)

Thou?
Thee?
I lynched Thee?

Awake me, God! I sleep!
What was that awful word Thou saidst?
That black and riven thing--was it Thee?
That gasp--was it Thine?
This pain--is it Thine?
Are, then, these bullets piercing Thee?
Have all the wars of all the world,
Down all dim time, drawn blood from Thee?

40/10/19

Have all the lies and thefts and hates--
Is this Thy Crucifixion, God,
And not that funny, little cross,
With vinegar and thorns?
Is this Thy kingdom here, not there,
This stone and stucco drift of dreams?

Help!
I sense that low and awful cry--
Who cries?
Who weeps?
With silent sob that rends and tears--
Can God sob?

Who prays?
I hear strong prayers throng by,
Like mighty winds on dusky moors--
Can God pray?

Prayest Thou, Lord, and to me?
Thou needest me?
Thou needest me?
Thou needest me?
Poor, wounded soul!
Of this I never dreamed. I thought--

Courage, God,
I come!

tray from dead hands, hurried into the street and ate ravenously, hiding to keep out the sights.

"Yesterday, they would not have served me," he whispered, as he forced the food down.

Then he started up the street,-looking, peering, telephoning, ringing alarms; silent, silent all. Was nobody - nobody? He dared not think the thought and hurried on.

Suddenly he stopped still. He had forgotten. My God! How could he have forgotten? He must rush to the Gateway — then he almost laughed. No — a car; if he could find a Ford. He saw one. Gently he lifted off the burden. And took his place at the wheel. He tested the throttle. There was gas. He glided off.

He ran out, looked involuntarily for cab or car, shivered and drew up the street. Everywhere stood, leaned, lounged, and lay the dead, in grim and awful silence. On he ran past an automobile, wrecked and overturned; past another, filled with a gay party whose smiles yet lingered on their death - struck lips; on past the Plaza and beside the park with its hushed babies and silent throng, until at last he saw a living face, pressed wildly against an upper window, and heard a human voice that sounded in his ears like the voice of God.

As they met at the threshold, they looked at each other a moment in silence. She young and beautiful, richly gowned, with darkly-last crowds & groups of cars passing by dead bodies, once at 42nd street he had to detour to Park avenue to avoid the dead congestion. He came back on Fifth avenue at 57th and flew uptown

"Hello - Hello - Help, in God's name!" wailed a voice at the other end. He moaned.

"Where are you?"

"At 426 Fifth Avenue. And there's - a dead girl here and a man and - and dead men lying in the street and dead horses - for the love of God come and bring the officers -" and the words trailed off into hysterical tears.

He wheeled the car in a sudden circle running over the still body of a child and leaping on the curb. Then he reached up the steps and burst the door and rang violently. There was a long pause and then the heavy door swung back. They stared a moment in silence. She had not guessed before that he was a Negro. ~~She~~ had not thought of her as red + white. She was a woman of perhaps ~~thirty~~ twenty five — rarely beautiful, richly gowned — with darkly

"I have searched and I have seen no other living soul but you."

She gasped and they stared at each other.

"My father!" she whispered.

30-1-3

"Where is he?"

"He started for the office."

"Where is it?"

"In the Metropolitan Tower."

"Leave a note for him here and come ~~with me~~."

Then he stopped.

"No" he said firmly — "first, we must go — to Harlem"

"Harlem!" She cried. Then she understood. She looked her boat at first unhesitantly. ~~Then~~ She looked back & shuddered. Then she came resolutely down the steps.

"There's a couple cars in the garage on the corner" She said. "I drive down town & drive it" he said

"I do." she answered.

In ten minutes they were flying to Harlem on the wind. The Stutz rose and raced like an airplane. They took the turn at 110th on two wheels and skidded into a shriek on 135th.

He was gone but a moment. When he returned & his face was grey. She did not look, but said:

"You have lost — somebody?"

"I have lost — everybody" he said, simply — "unless —"

He ran back and was gone several minutes — hours they seemed to her.

"Everybody" he said and he walked slowly back with something bulky-like in his hand which he stuffed into his pocket.

"I'm afraid I was selfish" he said. But already the car was roaring toward the dark among the dark & lined dead of Harlem — the brown skull faces the knotted hands the homely garments & the silence the mud & golden hair, and jewels. Yesterday, he thought with bitterness, she would scarcely have looked at him twice. He would have been dirt beneath her silken feet. She stared at him and started. Of all the sorts of men she had pictured as coming to her rescue she had not dreamed of one like him. Not that he was not - human, but he dwelt in a world so far from hers, so infinitely far, that he had seldom even entered her thought. Yet as she looked at him curiously he seemed quite commonplace and usual. He was a tall, dark workingman of the better class, with a sensitive face trained to stolidity and a poor man's clothes and hands. His face was soft and slow and his manner at once cold and nervous, like fires long-banked, but not out.

So a moment each paused and [illegible] the other; then the thought of the dead world without rushed in and they started toward each other.

"What has happened?" she cried. "Tell me! Nothing stirs. All is silence! I see the dead strewn before my window as winnowed by the breath of God, - and see -" She dragged him through great, silken hangings to where beneath the sheen of mahogany and silver, a little French maid lay stretched in quiet, everlasting sleep, and near her a butler lay prone in his livery.

The tears streamed down the woman's cheeks and she clung to his arm until the perfume of her breath swept his face and he felt the tremors racing through her body.

"I have been shut up in my dark room developing pictures of the comet which I took last night; when I came out - I saw the dead!"

"What has happened?" she cried again.

He answered slowly:

"Something - comet or devil - swept across the earth this morning and - many are dead!"

"Many? Very many?"

Dear Daughter:

I've gone for a hundred mile spin in Fred's new Mercedes. Shall not be back before dinner. I'll bring Fred with me.

"Come," she cried nervously, "We must search the city."

- Up and down, over and across, back again - on went that ghostly search. Everywhere was silence and death - death and silence! They hunted from Madison Square to Spuyten Duyvel; they rushed across the Williamsburg Bridge; they swept over Brooklyn; from the Battery and Morningside Heights they scanned the river. Silence, silence everywhere, and no human sign. Haggard and bedraggled they puffed a third time slowly down Broadway, under the broiling sun, and at last stopped. He sniffed the air. An odor - a smell-and with the shifting breeze a sickening stench filled their nostrils and brought its awful warning. The girl settled back help-

"Here he comes."

Into the glare of the electric lights the colored man moved slowly, with the eyes of ~~them that~~ those that walk and sleep.

"Well, what do you think of that?" ~~whispered~~ said a bystander; "of all New York, just a white girl and a ~~nigger~~ negro!"

The colored man heard nothing. He stood silently beneath the glare of the light, gazing at the money in his hand and shrinking as he gazed.

A woman mounted to the platform and looked about shading her eyes. She was brown, small and toil-worn, and in one arm lay a dark baby. The crowd parted and her eyes fell on the colored man, and with a cry she tottered toward him.

"Jim - husband!" she faltered, and dropped into his arms.

slowly he put his other hand into his pocket and brought out a baby's felt cap, and gazed against.

She hardly heard. She heard the lapping of the waters far below; the dark and restless waters - the cold and luring waters, as they called. He stepped within. Slowly she walked to the wall where the waters called below and stood + waiting. Long she waited and he did not come. Then with a start she saw him, too, standing beside the black waters. Slowly he removed his coat and stood there silent. She walked quickly to him and laid her hand on his arm. He did not start or look. The waters lapped on in luring deadly rythm. ~~Gently~~ He pointed down to the waters and said quietly:

"The world lies beneath the waters now - may I go?"

She looked into his stricken, tired face and a great pity surged within. She answered in a voice clear and calm -

"No."

Upward they turned toward life again and he seized the wheel. The world was darkening to twilight and a great grey pall was fallin g ~~was falling~~ mercifully and gently on the sleeping dead. The ghastly glare of reality seemed replaced with the dream of some vast romance. The girl lay silently back as the motor whizzed and flew and looked half-consciously for the elf-queen to wave life into this dead world again. And then as they whirled and swung into Madison Square and to the door of the Metropolitan Tower she gave a low cry and her eyes were great. Perhaps she had seen the Elf-queen.

The man lead her to the elevator of the tower and deftly they ascended. In her father's office they gathered rugs and chairs and he wrote a note and laid it on the desk, then they ascended to the roof and he made her comfortable. For a while she rested and sank to dreamy somnolence, watching the worlds above and wondering. Below lay the dark shadows of the city and afar the shining of the sea.

She glanced at him timidly ~~and~~ as he set food before her and took a shawl and wound her in it, touching her reverently, yet tenderly. She looked up to him with thankfulness in her eyes, eating what he served. He watched the city. She watched him. He seemed very human - very near now.

"Have you had to work hard?" she asked softly.

"Always," he said.

"I have always been idle," ~~she~~ she said, "I was rich".

"I was poor," he almost echoed.

"The rich and the poor are met together," she began, and he finished -

"The Lord is the maker of them all."

"Yes," she said slowly, "and how foolish our humandistinctions seem - now," looking down to the great dead city stretched below, swimming in unlightened shadows.

"Yes - I was not - human, yesterday," he said.

She looked at him -

"And your people were not my people," she said, "but today - " She paused. He was a man. Nay more, he was in some larger sense a gentleman, sensitive, kindly, chivalrous, everything save his hands and - his face. Yet yesterday -

"Death, the Leveler," he muttered.

"And the Revealer," she whispered gently, rising to her feet with great eyes. He turned away and fumbling a moment, sent a rocket into the darkening air. It rose, shrieked and flew, up a slim path of light, and scattering its stars abroad dropped onto the city below. She scarcely noticed it. A vision of the world had risen before her. Slowly the mighty prophesy of her destiny overwhelmed her. Above the dead past hovered the Angel of Annunciation. She was no mere woman. She was neither high nor low, white nor black, rich nor poor. She was primal Woman; mighty mother of all men to come and Bride of Life. She looked upon the man beside her and forgot all else but his manhood, his strong vigorous manhood - his sorrow and sacrifice. She saw him glorified: he was no longer a thing apart, a creature below, a strange outcaste of another crime and blood, but her Brother Humanity incarnate, Son of God and great All-Father of the race to be.

He did not glimse the glory in her eyes, but stood looking outward toward the sea and sending rocket after rocket into the unanswering darkness. Dark purple clouds lay banked and billowed in the west. Behind them and around the heavens glowed in dim weird radiance that suffused the darkening world and made almost a minor music. Suddenly, as though gathered back in some vast hand, the great cloud curtain fell away. Low on the horizon lay a long white star - mystic, wonderful. And from it fled upward to the pole, like some wan bridal veil, a pale wide sheet of flame, that lighted all the world and dimned the stars.

In facinated silence the man gazed at the heavens and dropped his rockets on the floor. Memories of memories stirred to life in the dead recesses of his mind. The shackles seemed to rattle and fall from his soul. Up from the cross and crushing, cringing of his caste, leapt the lone majesty of kings long dead. He rose within the shadows, tall straight and stern, with power in his eye and ghostly sceptres hovering to his grasp. It was as though some mighty Pharaoh lived again, or curled Assyrian lord. He turned and looked upon the lady and found her gazing straight at him.

Silently, immovably, they saw each other face to face - eye to eye. Their souls lay naked to the night. It was not lust, it was not love - it was some vaster, mightier thing, that needed neither tough of body nor thrill of soul. It was a thought divine, splendid.

Slowly , noiselessly they moved toward each other - the heavens above, the seas around, the city grim and dead below. He loomed from out the velvet shadows vast and dark. Pearl-white and slender she shone beneath the stars. She stretched her jewelled hands abroad. He lifted up his mighty arms, and they cried each to the other almost with one voice -

"The World is dead."

"Long live the - "

"Honk! Honk!" hoarse and sharp the cry of a motor drifted clearly up from the silence below. They started backward with a cry and gazed upon each other with eyes that faltered, and fell, with blood that boiled.

31-11-11

"Honk! - Honk!" - Honk! Honk!" came the mad cry again and almost from their feet a rocket blazed into the air and scattered its stars upon them. She covered her eyes with her hands and her shoulders heaved. He dropped and bowed, groped blindly on his knees about the floor, a blue flame spluttered lazily after an age and she heard the scream of the answering rocket as it flew.

Then they stood still as death, looking to opposite ends of the earth.

"Clang - crash - clang!"

The roar and ring of swift elevators shooting upward from below made the great tower tremble. A murmur and babel of voices swept in upon the night. All over the once dead city the lights blinked, flickered and flamed, and then with a sudden clanging of doors the entrance to the platform was filled with men and one with white and flying hair rushed to the girl and lifted her to his breast -

"My daughter," he sobbed

Behind him hurried a younger, comlier man, carefully clad in motor costume who bent above her with passionate solicitude and gazed into her staring eyes until they narrowed and dropped and her face flushed deep and deeper crimson.

"Julia," he whispered, "my darling, I thought you were gone forever."

She looked up at him with strange searching eyes.

"Fred," she murmured, almost vaguely, "is the world - gone?"

"Only New York," he answered, "it is terrible - awful, you know, - but you, how did you escape - how have you endured this horror? Are you well? Unharmed?"

"Unharmed!" she murmured.

"And this man here," he asked, encircling her drooping form with one arm and turning toward the negro. . Suddenly he stiffened and his hand flew to his hip - "Why!" he snarled, "It's - a - nigger - Julia! Has he - has he dared - "

She lifted her head and looked at her late companion curiously and then dropped her eyes with a sigh.

"He has dared - all, to rescue me," she said quietly, "And I - thank him - much." But she did not look at him again, only as the couple turned away, the father drew a roll of bills from his pockets.

"Here, my good fellow," he said thrusting them into the man's hands, "take that - what's your name?"

"Jim Davis!" came the answer, hollow-voiced.

"Well, Jim, I thank you. I've always liked your people. If you ever want a job, call on me." And they were gone.

31-11-18

The crowd poured up and out of the elevators, talking and whispering -

"Who was it?"

"Are they alive?"

"How many?"

"Two!"

"Who was saved?"

"A white girl and a nigger - there she goes!"

"A nigger? - where is he? Let's lynch the damned ~~yellow~~ -"

"Shut up - he's all right - he saved her,"

"Saved hell! He had no business - "

"Here he comes."

A HYMN TO THE PEOPLES

O Truce of God!
And primal meeting of the Sons of Man,
Foreshadowing the union of the World!
From all the ends of earth we come!
Old Night, the elder sister of the Day,
Mother of Dawn in the golden East,
Meets in the misty twilight with her brood,
Pale and black, tawny, red and brown,
The mighty human rainbow of the world,
Spanning its wilderness of storm.

Softly in sympathy the sunlight falls,
Rare is the radiance of the moon;
And on the darkest midnight blaze the stars--
The far-flown shadows of whose brilliance
Drop like a dream on the dim shores of Time,
Forecasting Days that are to these
As day to night.

So sit we all as one.
So, gloomed in tall and stone-swathed groves,
The Buddha walks with Christ!
And Al-Koran and Bible both be holy!

Almighty Word!
In this Thine awful sanctuary,
First and flame-haunted City of the Widened World,
Assoil us, Lord of Lands and Seas!

We are but weak and wayward men,
Distraught alike with hatred and vainglory;
Prone to despise the Soul that breathes within--
High visioned hordes that lie and steal and kill,
Sinning the sin each separate heart disclaims,
Clambering upon our riven, writhing selves,
Besieging Heaven by trampling men to Hell!

We be blood-guilty! Lo, our hands be red!
Not one may blame the other in this sin!
But here--here in the white Silence of the Dawn,
Before the Womb of Time,
With bowed hearts all flame and shame,
We face the birth-pangs of a world:
We hear the stifled cry of Nations all but born--
The wail of women ravished of their stunted brood!
We see the nakedness of Toil, the poverty of Wealth,
We know the Anarchy of Empire, and doleful Death of Life!
And hearing, seeing, knowing all, we cry:

Save us, World-Spirit, from our lesser selves!
Grant us that war and hatred cease,
Reveal our souls in every race and hue!
Help us, O Human God, in this Thy Truce,
To make Humanity divine!

Dilemma — W.E. Burghardt DuBois

My Friend is "free, white and 21." Which is to say - he is as free as the law and his income, and his family and friends allow. He is "white" so far as the records show and as tradition tells; he is not only 21, he is 41. He is respectable, i.e. he belongs to the Episcopal Church, the ~~Union League~~ City Club and the Republican party. He is educated, in the sense that he can read if he will, he can write in the absence of his stenographer and he has the privilege of buying two tickets to the Yale-Harvard football game. He is a reserve officer and a member of the American Legion. He reads the Times and the Evening Post (Saturday); he subscribes for the Atlantic and ~~Harper's~~ The Century and last year he read two books. He also began "Arrowsmith". He owns a home in Westchester assessed at twenty-five thousand; he drives a Buick. He associates quite often with a wife and a child of ten, and more often with his fellow employees of the wholesale house which pays him ~~$1500~~ $10,000 a year.

38-12-208

Frankly, my friend faces a dilemma. It is this: his pastor, the Reverend J. Simpson Stodges, D.D., preaches to him Sundays (except July, August and September) a doctrine that sounds like this:-(I say "sounds" because Dr. Stodges has explanations which mitigate the extremities of his ex-cathedra statements)-the Doctor asserts in sermons that Peace on Earth is the message of Christ the Divine leader of men; that this means Good Will ~~to~~ and Love for all human beings; that it means Forgiveness and Toleration of the mistakes, sins and shortcomings not only of your friends but of your enemies. That the Golden Rule of Christianity is to treat others as you want to be treated and that finally you should certainly at times, if not always, be willing to sacrifice your comfort, your convenience, your wealth and even your life not simply for the good of mankind but, turning the other cheek, to the Evil Doer.

Stated thus boldly this is to my Friend's mind pretty stiff doctrine for an ordinary human being of A.D.1925, and while he believes it in a sense, having been reared in a Godly and Presbyterian household and by a father who spared no rods and spoiled no children, yet, as he puts it to Dr. Stodges in his own parlor, Could a man live up to all that today? Now, Dr. Stodges out of the pulpit is a most companionable fellow; excellent family, good manners, Oxford accent and Brooks Brothers clothes. He plays keen golf, smokes a rare weed and knows a Bronx cocktail from a Manhattan. Well, the Doctor explained things rather satisfactorily. This Christian business of Peace, ~~Goodwill~~ Love, Forgiveness, the Golden Rule and Sacrifice was of course the Ideal. But, bless your soul, we can't all always attain the heights. Aim at 'em — that's the point, and in fact at least live a Gentleman with the "G" capitalized.

38-12-209

Now my friend is exceedingly anxious to be a gentleman. His father sneered at gentlemen and his grandfather for certain obscure reasons both hated them and denied their existence. But at college, at his club, and with his daily companions it appeared altogether desirable to be genteel - to have manners, an "air", and a tailor. As there was no one to preach gentility in plain words, my Friend has gathered this rather vague definition: a Gentleman relies on the Police and Law for protection and self-assertion; he ~~is~~ sustained by a fine Self Respect for himself and his Family, past and present; he is always courteous in public, with "Ladies first" and "Grey hairs" and even in private he minds his manners and dignity and resists his neighbor's wife; he is charitable, giving to the needy and deserving, to the poor and the proud, to artists and the church. And finally, without ostentation, he is exclusive, picking his associates with care and fine discrimination and appearing where the Best People appear.

Now my Friend knows that this vague conception lets one in for a certain snobbishness and tendency toward "climbing". And yet it does furnish atmosphere, comfort and a reasonable rule of life for a decent man. It is not of course the Christianity of the Devoted, nor the life ~~course~~ of the Knight Errant but it is a good, honest, middle path suited to good, honest, middle-aged men.

Now if the matter halted here my friend might be vaguely disappointed but fairly well satisfied. After all, in the work-a-day life we can't expect moral heroes in quantity. But the trouble is, my friend saw the edges of the Great War (from a swivel chair in America) and belongs to the American Legion. Also he reads the papers and talks in club lobbies. From this he has partially assimilated a new and alarming code of action. We've got to be "Prepared!" We've got to have an army and a big army for a big country. We need artillery and a lot of it; we need poison gas, we need airplanes; we need a militia, and a universal draft; we need big and terribly expensive battle ships and maneuvers. Preparedness — that's the word.

Well enough to think of a world of peace, but we haven't got it. Not only that but the world is not preparing for peace. Everywhere and all over it is preparing for war. What is the sense of a man even though he be big, strong, well, sitting down empty handed while around him are grouped a dozen men armed to the teeth with every device that brains and money can furnish? No, no, this will never do. America must be prepared for all eventualities. England wants her trade, France wants her money, Germany wants her markets, Russia wants her laborers, Italy wants her wage role, and above all - Japan. Japan is about to conquer the world for the yellow race and she is already picking on America. We must therefore be prepared.

Next to preparedness comes Justice and this justice is quite a different thing from the ~~good will~~ Love of the Christian or the ~~self respect~~ courtesy of the Gentleman. It is a matter of coldly, severely and without prejudice handing people their exact due. There should be no mawkishness with criminals or false pity with weaklings. A man who isn't a gentleman simply isn't a gentleman. There isn't any arguing about the matter. Human beings should be considered as facts and not as possibilities.

Next comes Patriotism, and patriotism means standing by your country thick and thin. It means not simply being an American but feeling proud of America and publicly asserting the same from time to time. Also it means seeing to it that other people are patriotic; looking about carefully when the Star Spangled Banner is played to see who is sitting down and why; keeping a watchful eye on the flag. Now all this is not simply "side" and "blurb". It's a kind of protection against the spiritual enemies of the country; a sort of insurance against avowed enemies and careless and thoughtful enemies.

Then on Patriotism is built Honor. We must have a national honor to defend so that people will have a care when they touch America or speak of America; when the American travelling abroad will have such a panoply thrown around him that street urchins will be afraid to throw stones or stick out their tongues. The honor of a country is its greatest asset. Minor questions may be arbitrated, but no arbitration for questions involving the National Honor. Honor and prestige are supreme for a nation and every individual must protect them.

Finally, my Friend learned that nations must have Power - physical power, economic power, power of mind, and that sort of thing. America must no longer be provincial. It must be among the great powers of the earth, consulted for all world movements. In fact, it is not too much to think of this marvellous country as a sort of super-power, umpire of humanity, tremendous, irresistable.

Now all these things intrigue my Friend. On his trip to Europe last summer he was made to feel more strongly his Americanism, partly in protest against the outrageous misunderstanding and apparent jealousy of America which he met, and partly from the complacency which swelled his breast when he noted what a great country America was in the eyes of Europe and how everybody was hanging on her lightest whisper. Would she please enter the League of Nations? Would she please grant some concessions in this matter of debts? Would she please lend a helping hand in China and Africa? And so forth and so on.

But there was one difficulty about this code of Americanism which my Friend learned and that was, it led directly and inevitably to another code to which, theoretically, he has always considered himself greatly opposed, but, which too, logically, he could not some how resist. It was not stated as clearly as any of the other codes; certainly did not come in Sunday sermons although he sometimes suspected it lurked there. It did not enter into his definition of "gentleman" and in fact seemed opposed to it. And yet without doubt all the gentlemen that he knew were strongly for it. It did seem logically bound up with his Americanism and yet there again, he resented the logical imputation.

The statement of this fourth code of action was found in confidential conversations, in unfinished sentences, in novels, in editorials written for obscure papers, in organizations like the "Ku Klux Klan" (which he thought was extremely silly and to be condemned.) And this code rested upon the fact that he was a White Man. Now until my Friend had reached the age of 40 he had not known that he was a white man; or at least he had not realized it. Certainly, of course, so far as his skin was concerned he knew he was not black, brown or excessively yellow; but it never occurred to him that there was any divine significance in that rather negative fact. But lately he had come to realize that his whiteness was fraught with tremendous responsibilities. It would seem that colored folks were about to ruin the world. They were going to overthrow white folks by sheer weight of numbers, destroy their homes and marry their daughters.

It was this last point that particularly got upon his nerves. He had a little girl of 10, rather pretty and fragile, and he and his wife were planning already certain advantageous family and economic alliances for the child. She was in an exclusive and expensive private school. Much of their social life was already being guided to this end of making her a social success. Now imagine a world where they would have to repel the advances of Chinamen or even of ~~American Negroes~~ a "nigger"!

He had noticed with some disturbed feeling that Negroes were not nearly as agreeable as they used to be. ~~They~~ He could not ~~get~~ hire a good colored cook and the yard man asked quite exorbitant wages. He had had to join in a neighborhood association to keep a Negro from buying a lot in the next block.

Now all this led him to understand, if not to sympathize with, a code which began with War. Not simply "preparedness" but war against the darker races, carried out now and without too nice discrimination as to who were dark; war against the Riff, the Turk, Chinese, Japanese, Indians, Negroes, Mulattoes, Italians and South Americans. Not simply war but propaganda to support war; emphasis upon "white": acting like a "white" man, doing things "white"; "white" angels, etc.; efforts to use novels in order to paint white heroes, black devils and brown scoundrels with yellow souls; efforts to use the movies for the same reason; emphasis upon race in crime news.

In this matter too there must not be too nice an honesty. Propaganda was propaganda; the crimes and shortcomings of white people must be suppressed and that of colored peoples over emphasized. That was the only way to make that true which ought to be true and which usually really was true. War, propaganda and then, Suspicion. It was very easy to be deceived by other races, to think of the Negro as "good-natured", of the Chinaman as simply "queer", of the Japanese as "imitative." No. Look out for low, subtle methods and death-dealing ideals. Meet them by full-blooded hatred and contempt for other races. Teach the hatred to children so it becomes instinctive. They won't get in trouble then by playing artlessly with colored children or even with colored dolls unless the dolls are arrayed ~~attired~~ as servants or clowns.

And finally, Empire; the white race as emperor of all the world and the world working for it. Now of course all this was perfectly natural. Naturally white men would and must rule and any question ~~of~~ as to their ruling should be met promptly. My friend had not ~~thought~~ dreamed that there was any question of this. He could not conceive of a world where white people did not rule colored people, or where colored folk dreamed to give orders to whites; and certainly, if the matter actually came to a trial of force, would he not naturally have to stand for War, Propaganda, Suspicion and Hatred in order to ~~put over~~ maintain the empire of the whites?

The trouble was, however, that when my Friend tabulated all of the codes which he at once and apparently simultaneously was to put in action, he found a most astonishing result and here it is:

38-12-214

Christian	Gentleman	American	White Man
Peace	Police	Preparedness	War
Love	Courtesy	Justice	Suspicion
Forgiveness	Charity	Patriotism	Propaganda
Golden Rule	Self-Respect	Honor	Contempt
Sacrifice	Exclusiveness	Power	Empire

Looking it over he doesn't know what on earth to do. It is not only dilemma, it is almost quadri-lemma. Or perhaps he might put a line between the Christian-Gentleman on the one hand and the American-White Man on the other and so arrange a very tremendous and puzzling dilemma. And my friend comes and sits down with me and asks me frankly what to do about it. And I? Why, I appeal to you, Gentle Reader. What should he do about it?

My Friend's fault, of course, is that he is logical. His reasoning is a clean, simple process like 2+2 = 4. This is the cause of his present unrest. Other folk are deliciously impervious to reason. They are pacifists with the help of the police and backed by careful preparation for war. They are filled with love for ~~all~~ mankind which they show by studied courtesy to their social equals, ~~and~~ ~~solemn~~, stern justice to ordinary folk, tinged with suspicion against strangers. They are willing to forgive much and to give to worthy causes so long as America is ueber alles. ~~even if we have to gloss the truth to prove~~ They certainly aim to treat others as others ought to be treated so far as this is consistent with their own self-respect - the Honor of their country and a perfectly natural contempt for inferiors. They believe in vicarious crucifixion for sin, in keeping the best society exclusive, in making America the greatest country on Earth and in annexing the Philippines.

38-12-215

This makes my Friend tear his pale hair. "How can they do it?" he yells. "It ain't reasonable." I explain: "They are playing acrostics!" See what they ~~might~~ do:

Peace
	Courtesy
		Patriotism
			Contempt

Love
	Charity
		Honor
			Empire

or,

			Suspicion
		Patriotism
	Self-Respect
Sacrifice

			War
		Justice
	Charity
Golden Rule

"Fact is," I add, "I've heard them singing in St. Thomas':-

"The Prince of Peace goes forth to war

" A Kingly Crown to ga - a - ain.

" His blood-red banner floats afar

" Who follows In His Name! "

"Your quotation is not exact," responds my literal friend.

"Perhaps not, but it combines and they combine: Peace, War, Empire, Bolshevism and Jesus Christ in one happy family."

"The trouble is," says my Friend, "that, take each column alone and it is to me absolutely convincing. I believe in it. Think of a world with Peace, Love, Forgiveness, the Golden Rule and Sacrifice! My God, what a Paradise despite disease and death and accident, cold and heat and storm - what? That fellow Gandhi is the only human leader today with the right idea. It's magnificent. It's tremendous. But - well, then I climb out of the clouds. This can't be a world of saints but why not a world of gentlemen - well-ordered, everybody at least polite; all the rich generous and the poor appreciative; each person with a natural self-respect which would let society be arranged in layers according to ability, desert and good birth.

~~Then look at these other columns. Suppose they are not logical, correct, compelling.~~ We cannot run this world without the police. We must not be discourteous even to the pushing, careless, impudent American fellow-citizen. Something is due our own self-respect. Then too, we must give of our services and of our money. If we do not somebody is going to take what we have. And above all, can we get on without being exclusive? I don't mean downright snobbishness but careful, nice, aristocracy in the best meaning of the term.

For after all, with all your democracy, blood will tell. Now that seems to me practical. They've got something like that in England. Or at least they had it before the war."

"But if I put this thing to the club as man to man; no sooner have I mentioned England than they're in arms. England, dammit, has a bigger navy than we with which she monopolizes the world carrying trade; she has a better trained army and she has more and better airplanes. And France won't pay us and has a big black army; and Russia is stirring up Revolution here and has a big Red army and I tell you what, we got to watch out. America is the greatest nation on earth and the world is jealous of her. We got to be prepared if it takes a billion a year for powder and guns. We've got to be disciplined;-stern justice for the lazy and criminal; training for boy scouts; militia. We must put the Honor of our country before everything — make 'em salute the flag, keep out the dirty foreigners and make America a Power!"

"Can we give that up? Can we go in for Humanity and the Inter-nation? Lord knows I'd like to but somehow I can't see it. Suppose America disarmed like Denmark, gave up poison gas, big battleships and dinky little officers in khaki. Suppose we stopped teaching thick and thin patriotism. I admit it isn't exactly honest business; America isn't so wonderful as nations go, but suppose that we did not believe it wonderful. Suppose that we emphasized the fact that Lincoln told smutty stories and Washington held slaves and Webster drank more than was good for him. Suppose we did not become powerful as well as big. What is going to happen to us? Well, there you are. We've got to be Americans even if we give up being Christians and Gentlemen."

"Or again," and here my Friend gets a bit embarrassed and red in the face: "You see," he says to me confidentially, "I've got a little daughter, young yet but a nice little thing. Probably is going to be pretty, certainly is going to have some money from her Aunt as well as a bit from me. She is being educated, and I may say rather expensively educated, in a private school. She may go in for some profession or she may, and I hope she will, marry well. There will be children and grandchildren and great grandchildren and so on ad infinitum. Now I tell you frankly, I want them all white. I do not even want to consider as her suitors Chinamen or 'niggers'. Can you for a moment conceive a world where brown men and dagoes were giving orders to white men and women? It would ruin civilization. Of course there may be a few exceptions but they can't think, they can't rule, they can't direct, and we mustn't let them try. And to keep them from trying we've got to pound them back into their places every time they show their heads above the ramparts."

"Well, I like America. Darn it! I love it. My father died for it and I was willing to. There's no doubt about it, lambs have got no business prowling about any lions and O Hell! — Honest to God, what do you think Asia and Africa would do to us if they got a chance?"

"Skin us alive," I answer cheerfully.

"Well then! Skin them and skin 'em first and keep 'em skinned. I'm a He-White-Man and I don't purpose to have no damned dago or cafe-au-lait descendents. Get me?"

[illegible] Jesus Christ!"

§ 2 Dilemma White Dilemma

My friend is free, white and 21. Which is to say - he is as free as the law and his income and his family and friends allow. He is "white" so far as the records show and as tradition tells; he is not only 21, he is 41. He is respectable i.e. he belongs to the Episcopal Church, the Union League and the Republican party. He is educated, in the sense that he can read if he will, he can write in the absence of his stenographer and he has the privilege of buying two tickets to the Yale-Harvard football game. He is a reserve officer and a member of the American Legion. He reads the Times and the Evening Post (Saturday); he subscribes for the Atlantic and Harper's and last year he read two books. He also began "Arrowsmith". He owns a home in Westchester assessed at twenty-five thousand; he drives a Buick. He associates quite often with a wife and a child of ten, and more often with his fellow employees of the wholesale house which pays him $7500 a year.

41-9-363

Frankly, my friend faces a dilemma. It is this: his pastor, the Reverend J. Simpson Stodges, D.D., preaches to him Sundays (except July, August and September) a doctrine that sounds like this:-(I say "sounds" because Dr. Stodges has explanations which mitigate the extremities of his ex-cathedra statements)-the Doctor asserts in sermons that Peace on Earth is the message of Christ the Divine leader of men; that this means Good Will to all human beings; that it means Forgiveness and Toleration of the mistakes, sins and shortcomings not only of your friends but of your enemies. That the Golden Rule of Christianity is to treat others as you want to be treated and that finally you should certainly at times, if not always, be willing to

[illegible] your comfort, your convenience, your wealth and even your [illegible] of mankind but, turning the other cheek,

[illegible] mind pretty stiff doctrine

for an ordinary human being of A.D.1925, and while he believes it in a sense, having been reared in a Godly and Presbyterian household and by a father who spared no rods and spoiled no children, yet, as he puts it to Dr. Stodges in his own parlor, Could a man live up to all that today? Now, Dr. Stodges out of the pulpit is a most companionable fellow; excellent family, good manners, Oxford accent and Brooks Brothers clothes. He plays keen golf, smokes a rare weed and knows a Bronx cocktail from a Manhattan. Well, the Doctor explained things rather satisfactorily. This Christian business of Peace, Goodwill, Forgiveness, the Golden Rule and Sacrifice was of course the Ideal. But, bless your soul, we can't all always attain the heights. Aim at 'em — that's the point, and in fact at least live a Gentleman with the "G" capitalized.

41-9-364

Now my friend is exceedingly anxious to be a gentleman. His father sneered at gentlemen and his grandfather for certain obscure reasons both hated them and denied their existence. But at college, at his club, and with his daily companions it appeared altogether desirable to be genteel - to have manners, an "air", and a tailor. As there was no one to preach gentility in plain words, my Friend has gathered this rather vague definition: a Gentleman relies on the Police and Law for protection and self assertion; he is sustained by a fine Self Respect for himself and his Family, past and present; he is always courteous in public, with "Ladies first" and "Grey hairs" and even in private he minds his manners and dignity and resists his neighbor's wife; he is charitable, giving to the needy and deserving, to the poor and the proud, to artists and the church. And finally, without ostentation, he is exclusive, picking his associates with care and fine discrimination and appearing where the Best People appear.

Now my Friend knows that this vague conception lets one in for a certain snobbishness and tendency toward "climbing". And yet it does furnish atmosphere, comfort and a reasonable rule of life for a decent man. It is not of course the Christianity of the Devoted, nor the course of the Knight Errant but it is a good, honest, middle path suited to good, honest, middle-aged men.

Now if the matter halted here my friend might be vaguely disappointed but fairly well satisfied. After all, in the work-a-day life we can't expect moral heroes in quantity. But the trouble is, my friend saw the edges of the Great War (from a swivel chair in America) and belongs to the American Legion. Also he reads the papers and talks in club lobbies. From this he has assimilated a new and alarming code of action. We've got to be prepared. We've got to have an army and a big army for a big country. We need artillery and a lot of it; we need poison gas, we need airplanes; we need a militia, a universal draft; we need big and terribly expensive battle ships and maneuvers. Preparedness — that's the word.

Well enough to think of a world of peace but we haven't got it. Not only that but the world is not preparing for peace. Everywhere and all over it is preparing for war. What is the sense of a man even though he be big, strong, well, sitting down empty handed while around him are grouped a dozen men armed to the teeth with every device that brains and money can furnish? No no, this will never do. America must be prepared for all eventualities. England wants her trade, France wants her money, Germany wants her markets, Russia wants her laborers, Italy wants her wage role, and above all - Japan. Japan is about to conquer the world for the yellow race and she is already picking on America. We must therefore be prepared.

Next to preparedness comes Justice and this justice is quite a different thing from the good will of the Christian or the self respect of the Gentleman. It is a matter of severely and without prejudice handing people their exact due. There should be no mawkishness with criminals or false pity with weaklings. A man who isn't a gentleman simply isn't a gentleman. There isn't any arguing about the matter. Human beings should be considered as facts and not as possibilities.

Next comes Patriotism, and patriotism means standing by your country thick and thin. It means not simply being an American but feeling proud of America and publicly asserting the same from time to time. Also it means seeing to it that other people are patriotic; looking about carefully when the Star Spangled Banner is played to see who is sitting down and why; keeping a watchful eye on the flag. Now all this is not simply "side" and "blurb". It's a kind of protection against the spiritual enemies of the country; a sort of insurance against avowed enemies and careless and thoughtful enemies.

Then on Patriotism is built Honor. We must have a national honor to defend so that people will have a care when they touch America or speak of America; when the American travelling abroad will have such a panoply thrown around him that street urchins will be afraid to throw stones or stick out their tongues. The honor of a country is its greatest asset. Minor questions may be arbitrated, but no arbitration for questions involving the national honor. Honor and prestige are supreme for a nation and every individual must protect it.

Finally, my Friend learned that nations must have Power - physical power, economic power, power of mind, and that sort of thing. America must no longer be provincial. It must be among the great powers of the earth, consulted for all world movements. In fact, it is not too much to think of this marvellous country as a sort of super-power, umpire of humanity, tremendous, irresistable.

Now all these things intrigue my Friend. On his trip to Europe last summer he was made to feel more strongly his Americanism, partly in protest against the outrageous misunderstanding and apparent jealousy of America which he met, and partly from the complacency which swelled his breast when he noted what a great country America was in the eyes of Europe and how everybody was hanging on her lightest whisper. Would she please enter the League of Nations? Would she please grant some concessions in this matter of debts? Would she please lend a helping hand in China and Africa? And so forth and so on.

But there was one difficulty about this code of Americanism which my Friend learned and that was, it led directly and inevitably to another code to which, theoretically, he was greatly opposed, but, logically, he could not some way resist. It was not stated as clearly as any of the other codes, certainly did not come in Sunday sermons although he sometimes suspected it lurked there. It did not enter into his definition of "gentleman" and in fact seemed opposed to it. And yet somehow all the gentlemen that he knew were strongly for it. It did seem logically bound up with his Americanism and yet there again, he resented the logical imputation.

The statement of this fourth code of action was found in unfinished sentences, in novels, in editorial written for obscure papers, in organizations like the Ku Klux Klan which he thought was extremely silly and to be condemned. And this code rested upon the fact that he was a White Man. Now until my Friend had reached the age of 40 he had not known that he was a white man, or at least he had not realized it. 41-9-368

Now all this led him to understand if not to sympathize with a code which began with War. Not simply preparedness but war against the darker races, carried out now and without too nice discrimination as to who were dark; war against the Riff, the Turk, Chinese, Japanese, Indians, Negroes, Mulattoes, Italians and South Americans. DILEMMA

My Friend is "free, white and 21". Which is to say - he is as free as the law and his income, and his family and friends allow. He is "white" so far as the records show and as tradition tells; he is not only 21, he is 41. He is respectable, i.e. he belongs to the Episcopal Church, the City Club and the Republican party. He is educated, in the sense that he can read if he will, he can write in the absence of his stenographer and he has the privilege of buying two tickets to the Yale-Harvard football game. He is a reserve officer and a member of the American Legion. He reads the Times and the Evening Post (Saturday); he subscribes for the Atlantic and the Century and last year he read two books. He also began "Arrowsmith". He owns a home in Westchester assessed at twenty-five thousand; he drives a Buick. He associates quite often with a wife and a child of ten, and more often with his fellow employees of the wholesale house which pays him $10,000 a year.

48-12-47

Frankly, my friend faces a dilemma. It is this: his pastor, the Reverend J. Simpson Stodges, D.D., preaches to him Sundays (except July, August and September) a doctrine that sounds like this: - (I say "sounds" because Dr. Stodges has explanations which mitigate the extremities of his ex-cathedra statements) - the Doctor asserts in sermons that "Peace on Earth" is the message of "Christ the Divine leader of men"; that this means Good will and Love for all human beings; that it means Forgiveness and Toleration of the mistakes, sins and shortcomings not only of your friends but of your enemies. That the Golden Rule of Christianity is to treat others as you want to be treated; and that finally you should certainly at times, if not always, be willing to sacrifice your comfort, your convenience, your wealth and even your life not simply for the good of mankind but, turning the other cheek, to the Evil Doer.

Stated thus boldly this is to my Friend's mind pretty stiff doctrine for an ordinary human being of A.D. 1925, and while he believes it in a sense, having been reared in a Godly and Presbyterian household and by a father who spared no rods and spoiled no children, yet, as he puts it to Dr. Stodges in his own parlor, Could a man live up to all that today? Now, Dr. Stodges out of the pulpit is a most companionable fellow; excellent family, good manners, Oxford accent and Brooks Brothers clothes. He plays keen golf, smokes a rare weed and knows a Bronx cocktail from a Manhattan. Well, the Doctor explained things rather satisfactorily. This Christian business of Peace, Love, Forgiveness, the Golden Rule and Sacrifice was of course the Ideal. But, bless your soul, we can't all always attain the heights. Aim at 'em -- that's the point, and in fact at least live a Gentleman with the "G" capitalized.

Now my friend is exceedingly anxious to be a gentleman. His father sneered at gentlemen and his grandfather for certain obscure reasons both hated them and denied their existence. But at college, at his club, and with his daily companions it appeared altogether desirable to be genteel - to have manners, an "air", and a tailor. As there was no one to preach gentility in plain words, my Friend has gathered this rather vague definition: a Gentleman relies on the Police and Law for protection and self-assertion; he is sustained by a fine Self Respect for himself and his Family, past and present; he is always courteous in public, with "Ladies first" and "Grey hairs" and even in private he minds his manners and dignity and resists his neighbor's wife; he is charitable, giving to the needy and deserving, to the poor and the proud, to artists and the church. And finally, without ostentation, he is exclusive, picking his associates with care and fine discrimination and appearing as often as possible where the Best People appear.

Now my Friend knows that this vague conception lets one in for a certain snobbishness and tendency toward "climbing". And yet it does furnish atmosphere, comfort and a reasonable rule of life for a decent man. It is not of course the Christianity of the Devoted, nor the life of the Knight Errant but it is a good, honest, middle path suited to good, honest, middle-aged men.

Now if the matter halted here my friend might be vaguely disappointed but fairly well satisfied. After all, in the word-a-day life we can't expect moral heroes in quantity. But the trouble is, my Friend saw the edges of the Great War (from a swivel chair in America) and belongs to the American Legion. Also he reads the papers and talks in club lobbies. From this he has partially assimilated a new and alarming code of action. We've got to be "Prepared!" We've got to have an army and a big army for a big country. We need artillery and a lot of it; we need poison gas, we need airplanes; we need a militia and a universal draft; we need big and terribly expensive battle ships and maneuvers. Preparedness -- that's the word.

Well enough to think of a world of peace, but we haven't got it. Not only that but the world is not preparing for peace. Everywhere and all over it is preparing for war. What is the sense of a man even though he be big, strong, well, sitting down empty handed while around him are grouped a dozen men armed to the teeth with every device that brains and money can furnish? No, no, this will never do. America must be prepared for all eventualities. England wants her trade, France wants her money, Germany wants her markets, Russia wants her ~~laborers~~ capital, Italy wants her wage role, and above all - Japan! Japan is about to conquer the world for the yellow race and she is already picking on America. We must therefore be prepared.

Next to preparedness comes Justice and this justice is quite a different thing from the Love of the Christian or the courtesy of the Gentleman. It is a matter of coldly, severely and without prejudice handing people their exact due. There should be no mawkishness with criminals or false pity with weaklings. A man who isn't a gentleman simply isn't a gentleman. There isn't any arguing about the matter. Human beings should be considered as facts and not as possibilities.

Next comes Patriotism, and patriotism means standing by your country thick and thin. It means not simply being an American but always and everywhere feeling proud of America and publicly asserting the same from time to time. Also it means seeing to it that other people are patriotic; looking about carefully when the Star Spangled Banner is played to see who is sitting down and why; keeping a watchful eye on the flag. Now all this is not simply "side" and "blurb". It's a kind of protection against the spiritual enemies of the country; a sort of insurance against avowed enemies and careless friends ~~and thoughtful enemies.~~

Then on Patriotism is built Honor. We must have a national honor to defend so that people will have a care when they touch America or speak of America; when the American travelling abroad will have such a panoply thrown around him that street urchins will be afraid to throw stones or stick out their tongues. The honor of a country is its greatest asset. Minor questions may be arbitrated, but not arbitration for questions involving the National Honor. Honor and prestige are supreme for a nation and every individual must protect them.

Finally, my Friend learned that nations must have Power- physical power, economic power, power of mind, and that sort of thing. America must no longer be provincial. It must be among the great powers of the earth, consulted for all world movements. In fact, it is not too much to think of this marvellous country as a sort of super-power, umpire of humanity, tremendous, irresistible.

Now all these things intrigue my Friend. On his trip to Europe last summer he was made to feel more strongly his Americanism, partly in protest against the outrageous misunderstanding and apparent jealousy of America which he met, and partly from the complacency which swelled his breast when he noted what a great country America was in the eyes of Europe and how everybody was hanging on her lightest whisper. Would she please enter the League of Nations? Would she please grant some concessions in this matter of debts? Would she please lend a helping hand in China and Africa? And so forth and so on.

But there was one difficulty about this code of Americanism which my Friend learned and that was, it led directly and inevitably to another code to which, theoretically, he has always considered himself greatly opposed; but, which too, logically, he could not somehow resist. It was not stated as clearly as any of the other codes; certainly it did not come in Sunday sermons although he sometimes suspected it lurked there. It did not enter into his definition of "gentleman" and in fact seemed opposed to it. And yet without doubt all the gentlemen that he knew were strongly for it. It did seem logically bound up with his Americanism and yet there again, he resented the logical imputation.

The statement of this fourth code of action was found in confidential conversations, in unfinished sentences, in novels, in editorials written for obscure papers, in organizations like the "Ku Klux Klan" (which he thought was extremely silly and to be condemned.) And this code rested upon the fact that he was a White Man. Now until my Friend had reached the age of 40 he had not known that he was a white man; or at least he had not realized it. Certainly, of course, so far as his skin was concerned he knew he was not black, brown nor excessivèdy yellow; but it never occurred to him that there was any divine significance in that rather negative fact. But lately he had come to realize that his whiteness was fraught with tremendous responsibilities. It would seem that colored folks were about to ruin the world. They were going to overthrow white folks by sheer weight of numbers, destroy their homes and marry their daughters.

He, himself had noticed with some disturbed feeling that Negroes were not nearly as agreeable as they used to be. He could not hire a good colored cook and the yard man asked quite exorbitant wages. He had had to join in a neighborhood association to keep a Negro from buying a lot in the next block.

Now all this led him to understand, if not to sympathize with, a code which began with War. Not simply "preparedness" but war against the darker races, carried out now and without too nice discrimination as to who were dark; war against the Riff, the Turk, Chinese, Japanese, Indians, Negroes, Mulattoes, Italians and South Americans. Not simply war but propaganda to support war; emphasis upon "white": acting like a "white" man, doing things "white"; "white" angels, etc.; efforts to use novels in order to paint white heroes, black devils and brown scoundrels with yellow souls; efforts to use the movies for the same reason; emphasis upon race in crime news.

In this matter too there must not be too nice an honesty. Propaganda was propaganda; the crimes and shortcomings of white people must be suppressed and that of colored peoples over emphasized. That was the only way to make that true which ought to be true and which usually really was true. War, propaganda and then Suspicion. It was very easy to be deceived by other races, to think of the Negro as "good-natured", of the Chinaman as simply "queer", of the Japanese as "imitative". No. Look out for low, subtle methods and death-dealing ideals. Meet them by full-blooded hatred and contempt for other races. Teach the hatred to children so it becomes instinctive. They won't get in trouble then by playing artlessly with colored children or even with colored dolls unless the dolls are arrayed as servants or clouns.

And finally, Empire; the white race as emperor of all the world and the world working for it. Now of course all this was percectly natural. Naturally white men would and must rule and any question as to their ruling should be met promptly. My friend had not dreamed that there was any question of this. He could not conceive of a world where white people did not rule colored people or where colored folk presumed to give orders to whites; and certainly, if the matter actually came to a trial of force, would he not naturally have to stand for War, Propaganda, Suspicion and Hatred in order to maintain the empire of the whites?

The trouble was, however, that when my Friend tabulated all of the codes which he at once and apparently simultaneously was to put in action, he found a most astonishing result and here it is:

Christian	Gentleman	American	White Man
Peace	Police	Preparedness	War
Love	Courtesy	Justice	Suspicion
Forgiveness	Charity	Patriotism	Propaganda
Golden Rule	Self-Respect	Honor	Contempt
Sacrifice	Exclusiveness	Power	Empire

Looking it over he doesn't know what on earth to do. It is not only dilemma, it is almost quadri-lemma. Or perhaps he might put a line between the Christian-gentleman on the one hand and the American-

White Man on the other and so arrange a very tremendous and puzzling dilemma. And my friend comes and sits down with me and asks me frankly what to do about it. And I? Why, I appeal to you, Gentle Reader. What should he do about it?

My Friend's fault, of course, is that he is logical. His reasoning is a clear, simple process like 2+2 = 4. This is the cause of his present unrest. Other folk are deliciously impervious to reason. They are pacifists with the help of the police and backed by careful preparation for war. They are filled with love for mankind which they show by studied courtesy to their social equals, stern injustice to ordinary folk, tinged with suspicion against strangers. They are willing to forgive much and to give to worthy causes so long as America is ueber alles. They certainly aim to treat others as others ought to be treated so far as this is consistent with their own self-respect,* the Honor of their country and a perfectly natural contempt for inferiors. They believe in vicarious crucifixion for sin, in keeping the best society exclusive, in making America the greatest country on Earth and in annexing the Philippines.

This makes my Friend tear his pale hair. "How can they do it?" he yells. "It ain't reasonable." I explain:- "They are playing acrostics!" See what they do:

Peace

Courtesy

Patriotism

Contempt

Love

Charity

Honor

Empire

Or,

48-12-54

Suspicion

Patriotism

Self-Respect

Sacrifice

War

Justice

Charity

Golden Rule

"Fact is", I add, "I've heard them singing in St.Thomas':-

"The Prince of Peace goes forth to war

"A Kingly Crown to ga - a - ain!

"His blood-red banner floats afar

"Who follows In His Name!"

"Your quotation is not exact," responds my literal friend.

"Perhaps not, but it combines and they combine: Peace, War, Empire, Bolshevism and Jesus Christ in one happy family."

"The trouble is," says my Friend, "that, take each column alone and it is to me absolutely convincing. I believe in it. Think of a world with Peace, Love, Forgiveness, the Golden Rule and Sacrifice! My God, what a Paradise despite disease and death and accident, cold and heat and storm - what? That fellow Gandhi is the only human leader today with the right idea. It's magnificent. It's tremendous. But - well, then I climb out of the clouds. This can't be a world of saints but why not a world of gentlemen - well-ordered, everybody at least polite; all the rich generous and the poor appreciative; each person with a natural self-respect which would let society be arranged in layers according to ability, desert and good birth. We cannot run this world without the police. We must not be discourteous even to the pushing, careless, impudent American fellow-citizen. Something is due our own self-respect. Then too, we must give of our services and of our money. If we do not somebody is going to take what we have. And above all, can we get on without being exclusive? I don't mean downright snobbishness but careful, nice, aristocracy in the best meaning of the term. For after all, with all your democracy, blood will tell. Now that seems to me practical. They've got something like that in England. Or at least they had it before the war."

"But if I put this thing to the club as man to man, no sooner have I mentioned England than they're in arms. England, dammit, has a bigger navy than we with which she monopolizes the world carrying trade; she has a better trained army and she has more and better airplanes. She has cornered all the Oil and Rubber. And France won't pay us and has a big black army; and Russia is stirring up Revolution here and has a big Red; army and 'I tell you what, we got to watch out!' America is the greatest nation on earth and the world is jealous of her. We got to be prepared if it takes a billion a year for powder and guns. We've got to be disciplined;- stern justice for the lazy and criminal; training for boy scouts; militia. We must put the Honor of our country before everything -- make 'em salute the flag, keep out the dirty foreigners and make America a Power!"

"Can we give that up? Can we go in for Humanity and the International? Lord knows I'd like to but somehow I can't see it. Suppose America disarmed like Denmark, gave up poison gas, big battleships and dinky little officers in khaki. Suppose we stopped teaching thick and thin patriotism. I admit it isn't exactly honest business; America isn't so wonderful as nations go, but suppose that we did not believe it wonderful? Suppose that we emphasized the fact that Lincoln told smutty stories and Washington held slaves and Webster drank more than was good for him? Suppose we did not become powerful as well as big. What is going to happen to us? Well, there you are! We've got to be Americans even if we give up being Christians and Gentlemen."

" "Or again," and here my Friend gets a bit embarrassed and red in the face: "You see," he says to me confidentially, "I've got a little daughter, young yet but a nice little thing. Probably is going to be pretty, certainly is going to have some money from her Aunt as well as a bit from me. She is being educated, and I may say rather expensively educated, in a private school. She may go in for some profession or she may, and I hope she will, marry well. There will be children and grandchildren and great grandchildren and so on ad infinitum. Now I tell you frankly, I want them all white. I do not even want to consider as her suitors Chinamen or 'niggers'. Can you for a moment conceive a world where brown men and dagoes were giving orders to white men and women? It would ruin civilization. Of course there may be a few exceptions but they can't think, they can't rule, they can't direct, and we mustn't let them try. And to keep them from trying we've got to pound them back into their places every time they show their heads above the ramparts."

4/8-12-57

"Well, I like America. Darn it! I love it. My father died for it and I was willing to. There's no doubt about it, lambs have got no business prowling about any lions and O Hell! - Honest to God, what do you think Asia and Africa would do to us if they got a chance?"

"Skin us alive." I answer cheerfully.

"Well then! Skin them and skin 'em first and keep 'em skinned. I'm a He-White-Man and I don't purpose to have no damned dago or cafe-au-lait descendents. Get me?"

His tones were deep and ~~tor~~rot und and he rolled his eyes. Then he added in a thin voice: "Sound like a bloody bounder, don't I?"

And finally after a pause he whispered faintly: "Jesus Christ!"

Was he swearing or praying?

The Inferior Culture

"Just like niggers!"

"This is what colored people always do."

"What can you expect of the 'brother'?"

"I wish to God I had been born white!"

The conversation took place at midnight and among colored folk. There were no white persons present. Four persons had spent an evening playing bridge and now were waiting until a fifth, the hostess, brought in the supper. The apartment was small but comfortable; perhaps a little too full of conventional furniture which did not altogether agree in pattern, but evidently the home of rather fairly well-to-do people who liked each other and were enjoying themselves. But of course they had begun to discuss "the problem" which no group of colored people can long keep from discussing. There was a young colored teacher from the public schools of New York — well-paid and well-dressed, with a comely face and an arresting personality. She was from the South. Her mother had been servant and housekeeper in a ~~well-to-do~~ wealthy Southern white family. Her grandmother had been a slave of their own grandfather. This teacher was complaining bitterly of her walk through Harlem that night; of the loud and vulgar talking; of the way in which the sidewalks were blocked; of the familiarity and even insults of dark loafers ~~if she paid them any attention~~; of the insistent bad manners and resentful attitude of so many of these Harlem folk.

The lawyer lighted a cigar. It certainly is a question where to live, he said. He had been educated at Fisk University and brought in contact for eight years with Northern white teachers. Then he had gone to the west and eventually studied law at the University of Michigan. He was big, dark, good-natured and well-dressed. He complained of the crowded conditions of living in Harlem; of the noise and dirty in any Negro community; of the fact that if you went out to a better class white neighborhood you could not rent, you had to buy; if you did but pretty soon Negroes of all sorts and kinds came crowding in; ~~property values fell;~~ homes were transformed into lodging houses; undesirable elements became your neighbors." I started ~~to leave my~~ our of the apartment ~~the other day~~ last night; there was a ppol of blood in front of it, where there had been ~~a quarrel and~~ drunken brawl cutting the night before." A young, slim, cream-colored physician, native of New York and a graduate of its schools, but compelled to go to Howard in order to finish The clinical work of his medical education, looked uncomfortable." I don't mind going with colored people; I ~~like~~ prefer it, if they are my kind; but if I go out to lunch here in Harlem I get pork chops and yams which I do not ~~enjoy~~ like, served on a table cloth which ~~was~~ is not clean ~~once but not at present~~, set down negligently by ~~careless~~ indifferent waiters. In the movies here uptown I find miscellaneous and often ill-smelling neighbors. On my vacation, where should I — where can I go? The part of Atlantic City open to me, I continue to frequent, because I see so many charming friends of mine from all over the land; but always I get sick at heart at the discrimination, that is bad enough; but not only on the board walk in the restaurants, on the beach, in the amusements I get sick at the kind of people colored against whom I want to discriminate ~~against~~ myself. We tried to support ~~Walls~~ see who crowded in; a colored section of the beach; we failed."

"Yes, but ~~Well~~, that is all ~~a matter of~~ pleasure or convenience," said the fourth man. He was an insurance agent, playing a difficult game of chance with people who make weekly payments to him and then tried to beat him by malingering; or with others who paid promptly ~~and regularly~~ and had their claims disallowed by the higher-ups. "What I am bothered about," he said, "is this poverty, sickness and crime; the hold-ups and murders of colored people by colored people, ~~and with colored people for victims.~~ I am afraid to go to some places to make my collections. I don't know what is going to become of Negroes at this rate." Just then the fifth member of the party, the wife of the insurance agent, emerged from the kitchen where she had been arranging the lunch. She was pretty and ~~yellow~~ olive, and a little inclined to be fat. She was the daughter of dark laborers who had gone to Boston after emancipation. She had been educated in the public schools and was a social worker before she was married. She knew how to cook and baked pies, and was accompanied by a delicious aroma of coffee, hot biscuits and fried chicken. She had been listening to the conversation from outside and she came in saying, "What's got me worried to death is where I am going to send Junior to school. Junior is bright and has got nice manners, if I do say it, but I just can't send him to these Harlem schools. I was visiting them yesterday: dirt, noise, bad manners, filthy halls, no discipline, over-crowded. I just can't send Junior there." This was a fairly characteristic colored group of the better class and they were voicing that bitter inner criticism of Negroes directed upon themselves, which is widespread. It tends often to fierce, angry, contemptuous judgment of nearly all that Negroes do, say and believe. Of course these words are seldom voiced in the presence of white folk. Everyone of these persons would eagerly and fiercely defend their "race".

Such But these complaints are the natural reaction of people toward the low average of culture among American Negroes.

There is some exaggeration here, which the critics themselves if challenged would readily admit; and yet there is sound basis for much of this criticism. Similar phenomena may be noticed always among suppressed peoples or groups undergoing extraordinary experience. None have more pitilessly castigated Jews than the Jewish prophets. It is the Irish themselves who rail at the "dirty Irish trick". Nothing could exceed the self-abasement of the Germans during the Sturm und Drang. Negro self-criticism may often be over-abasement, but it recognizes a perfectly obvious fact and that fact is that most Negroes in the United States today occupy a low cultural status; both low in itself and low as compared with the national average in the land. All Negroes do not fall culturally below all whites. But if one selects any one of the obviously low cultural groups in the United States, the proportion of Negroes who belong to it will be larger than the Negro proportion in the total population. Nor is there anything singular about it; the real miracle would be if this were not so. Former slavery, present poverty and ignorance, with the inevitable resulting sickness and crime, are adequate social explanation.

This low social condition of the majority of Negroes is not merely a problem of the whites; a question of social uplift of an alien group within their midst; a problem of social contact and political ~~enfranchisement~~ power. However it may be thus rationalized and explained, it must be, at any current moment, primarily an inner problem of the Negro group itself and a problem with which this group is forced itself to grapple.

No matter what the true ~~explanation is~~ reasons are, or where the blame lies, the fact remains that among twelve million American Negroes there are today poverty, ignorance, bad manners, disease and crime.

A determined fight has been made upon Negro ignorance, both within and without the group, and the results have been ~~gratifying~~ notable. Nevertheless, this is still an ignorant people. One in every six Negroes ten years of age and over admitted ~~at the last census~~ in 1930 that they could not read and write. It is probable that one in every three would have been justified in confessing to practical illiteracy, ~~and widespread~~ in experience and lack of knowledge of the meaning of the modern world. In the South not one-half the colored children from five to sixteen are regularly in school and the majority of the schools are not good schools. Any poor, ignorant people herded by themselves filled with more or less articulate resentment, are bound to be bad mannered; and the mass of American Negroes have retrograded in this respect. There has been striking improvement in the Negro death rate. It is better than that of most of South American countries, of Italy, Japan and Spain even before the war. Nevertheless it is still bad and costly, and the toll in tuberculosis, pneumonia, heart disease, syphilis and homicide is far too high. It is hard to know just what the criminal tendencies of the American Negroes are, for our crime statistics are woefully inadequate; but we do know that in proportion to population three times as many Negroes are arrested as whites. Many of them probably are innocent of grave crimes; but the disorderly conduct of the poor and sick is always manifest among Negroes: theft and burglary, fighting, breaking the gambling and liquor laws and above all killing each other.

Above all the Negro is poor: poor by heritage from 244 years of chattel slavery, by emancipation with no land or capital and by 75 years of additional wage exploitation to cause peonage. Sudden industrial changes like the Civil War

The Negro worker has been especially hard hit by the current depression. Of the nearly three million Negro families in the United States today probably the breadwinners of a million are unemployed, and another million on the lower margin of decent subsistence. Assuming a gradual restoration of fairly normal conditions it is probable that not more than two per cent of the Negro families in the United States would have an income of $2,500 a year and over; while fifty-eight per cent would have incomes between $500 and $2,500.

This social degradation is intensified and emphasized by segregation; unfairly get work, discrimination in pay, untrustworthy of transportation and, more fundamentally, physical segregation from contact with manners customs meantimes I afford decent handrecks

The World War and the stress of speculation during the twenties have upset this

By outer pressure, in most cases they must live among themselves; neighbors to their own people in segregated parts of the city, in segregated country districts. The segregation is not complete and most of it is customary rather than legal. Nevertheless, most Negroes live with Negroes, in what are on the whole the least pleasant dwelling places, although not necessarily always bad places in themselves. ~~If they do not so live, they must dwell in little isolated centers more or less alone.~~

This means that they live in districts of low cultural level; that their contacts with their fellow men involve contacts with people largely untrained and ignorant, frequently noisy and sometimes anti-social. These districts are not usually protected by the police — and indeed rather victimized and tyrannized over by them. City services of water supply, garbage removals, street-cleaning, lighting, noise & traffic regulation, schools & hospitals/sanitation are usually neglected or withheld. Saloons, ~~the~~ brothels and gambling rule these areas with open or tacit police consent.

No matter in what degree or in what way the action of the white population may increase or decrease these social problems, they remain the present problems which must be faced by colored people.

By colored people of widely different classes

It goes without saying that while the Negroes are thus manifestly of low average culture, almost no where or at any time do they form a homogeneous group. They are of different ~~blood~~ descent, from families with ~~different~~ varied education experiences, born in various parts of the country and under various conditions. They have gone through, in differing degrees, periods of great and vital social change; they have experienced different contacts with other people and groups.

~~The~~ house servant during slavery in the South for instance came in close and intimate contact with the white master class; from it he received ideals of courtesy manners and good living. Traces of this training could long be found in New Orleans, Richmond and consciousness

Negroes who do not live in a few good white districts can organize in a neighborhood & in time win control of politics & the police, with the argument here & other neighborhoods & so gradually drive out the worst criminals, with the resultant rise in rent and Charleston; Philadelphia and New York among the better Negro groups. But this cultural ideal ~~was only possible for~~ could be maintained only among people with money and power. Another ~~and later~~, more assimilable and ~~also a~~ higher ideal came to the Negroes through the mission school in the South succeeding the war. The more simple and austere intellectual life of New England with its plain living and high thinking; its cleanliness and conscience, was brought into direct ~~if not wide~~ contact with Negro life. Its influence is still felt among the descendants of those trained at Fisk and Atlanta, Hampton and Talladega and a score of other schools.

~~The emancipation of Negroes and their rise~~ But to greater independence and self-direction resulted ~~also~~ in greater cultural segregation. The old bonds between servants and masters in the South ~~began to~~ disappear. The white New England teachers gradually withdrew from the Southern schools, hastily by crude pressure, to make place for Negroes whom they had trained. Thus there is more or less clearly defined upper layer ~~consists~~ of the more educated and ~~refined and~~ ambitious of the Negroes, ~~and those of some of the lower levels striving~~ to escape from the depths, ~~find~~ themselves faced with problems with which they have had no social institutions capable of dealing.

Stranded and alone; unable to share the social institutions of the cultured of the white race

The Negro of education & income is hampered on beside the careless ignorant & criminal & has no organs of institutions for self protection & reform. He recoils from attack & the white only, for this he feels is a form of self accusation, of attack on the Negro race. & invites the sorry reproach: "Well, if you can't live with Negroes, how do you expect us?" There is little or no chance for a Negro family to remove to a quiet neighborhood, or a protected suburb or a college town. I tried once to buy a home on the Sage Foundation development at Forest Hills, Long Island. Robert De Forest & his directors hesitated but finally refused and definitely

For escape of the Negro cultured & areas of white culture, with the consequent acceleration of acculturation there is small opportunity instead of necessary flow contact with the educator and cultural the nature over, actually in the doing num-with exceptions, decreased contacts and and crime of Negro slums, instead of trying to escape to white neighborhoods of the better class, why do ~~you~~ they not establish ~~your~~ their own exclusive neighborhoods?

In other words why does not the Negro race build up a class structure of its own, parallel to that of the whites, but separate, and include in its own social, economic and religious institutions?

This procedure has always commended itself to the prouder and more independent type of Negro; to the black man who is tired of begging for justice and recognition from folk who have no intention of being just and do not propose to recognize Negroes as men. In its extreme form this plan would envisage migration to Africa or elsewhere; but the whole policy of ~~colonial~~ imperialism has shown Negroes that there is as yet small chance for independent social development in ~~such lands~~ colored colonies. Here in America, the vision has sometimes taken the form of separate areas, states or cities for Negro settlement and development. But what neither white nor black advocates of more or less complete segregation do not usually realize, is that success here calls for implemented cordial of the Negro masses by their leading classes. It calls for new economic ~~foundations~~ organization, political power and other social institutions which will give this segregated structure opportunity for defense, education, and strong development in civilization. Segregation will, too often of itself, is dead.

~~The real value of this necessary [illegible]~~ has repeatedly shown Negroes to evolve, as racial sentiment Social institutions to ~~will~~ protect his development & encourage & guide it, under such time as ~~[illegible]~~ race barriers fall & becomes questionable complete separation is no necessary

What now is the practical path for the solution of the problem? Usually it has been assumed in such cases that the culture recruits rising from a submerged group will be received more or less willingly by corresponding classes of ~~other~~ neighboring or enveloping groups. Even when, ~~from selfishness or loyalty~~ from jealousy of manner or pride of ~~position~~ formality such willingness is not manifested, nevertheless the possibility of continued exclusion of the ~~cultured~~ whites from the centers of culture is small. Thus in the United States the Irish and the Italian have not always been welcomed as they have risen in the social scale. Nevertheless there has been no method of long on entirely excluding them. In the case of the Negro the unwillingness is greater and public opinion supports it to such a degree that admission of kind ~~to~~ to cultured circles is slow and difficult ~~will take a long time~~. It still remains possible in the United States for a white American to be a gentleman and a scholar, a Christian and a man of ~~high character~~ integrity and ~~still~~ yet flatly and openly refuse to treat as a fellow human being, any person who has Negro ancestry. It is even regarded as unethical, if not a crime, to conceal such ancestry when if it is not generally known. ~~Under such circumstances the apparent path of progress for Negroes is on the one hand to continue to ask admission to the ranks of the cultured and evidently to deserve it.~~ On the other hand to demand recognition from ~~the cultured~~ of course. It may be pointed out ~~in favor of this method~~ that despite race prejudice and color isolation, there have in the past continually been members of the Negro race who have risen to cultural equality with the best of the nation. ~~These~~ The cultural ~~elements~~ gifts of the Negro to America are of considerable importance. It is hardly possible today fairly to examine culture in America without recognizing the part that the Negro has played or is playing. ~~It might of course~~ But it may fairly be asked, on what terms ~~this culture and~~ these individuals who bore it have been ~~received~~ allowed to live and work? How far the attitude of ~~begging~~ distaste and ~~complaining~~ reluctant reception has improved ~~its~~ the quality of the Negro contribution, or debased it? and there must certainly have been ~~many~~ large numbers of Negroes capable of aiding sharing American culture who have played no such part because of discouragement or because of their pride and revulsion of feeling at the price of admission.

The other ~~method~~ path which commends itself to many whites and some Negroes ~~the prouder and more independent sort~~ of Negro ~~and which is also urged upon him by whites~~ (whose motives often to be sure ~~might be suspected~~ are) is cultural segregation of the upper classes of Negroes ~~at once~~ from their own ~~classes and~~ masses from the whites of all classes. It has been said time and time again: if certain classes of Negroes do not like the squalor ~~and~~ filth

How far this influence has come from direct individual contact, and in how many cases but?

So far as this advice of white folk is sincere, it says in effect: arrange the relation of your educated and progressive classes to the masses of your folk in the way we have. This is a peculiar admission for America, because in theory America has no classes and only admits such class structure in its caste degradation of Negroes, which is conceived of by the unthinking as a matter of parallel layers. If it becomes a vertical structure then this advice admits that there is such a vertical structure of classes among white Americans which, of course, we know is perfectly true. We know too that this is an American imitation of the older European class structure.

The flight of cultured individuals and groups from lower to higher social groups is a common phenomenon in the world and has come to be looked upon as normal and necessary development; as a way in which a people progress and rise in civilization. It is, however, a theory that requires examination. The isolation of the more cultured elements of a community with restrictions and bars upon their contacts with the masses, presents some difficulties.

a hierarchy of social classes with the domination of the higher classes implemented by education and ability, by the power of wealth and consequent political power. The distribution of these various elements is not even. High culture may exist with moderate wealth and wealth may be somewhat restrained by political power. Nevertheless usually there are these three elements in the dominating culture classes. These higher social levels are recruited not only by their own offspring but from the talented and ambitious out of the lower levels,

The lower levels have looked for and found vicarious salvation in surrendering their best from time to time to the upper classes, until this method of raising the average culture of a people has come to be looked upon as natural and inevitable. Philosophers have become reconciled to this desertion and abandonment of a permanent substratum of humanity, on the ground that this class would become progressively smaller and smaller and yet never wholly disappear. Indeed efforts to make the lower classes disappear have been regarded as against nature and a sort of attack on civilization.

PP Let us examine in general the manner out of which the idea of the successive hierarchy of several classes has arisen

Turn

Does this method really protect culture and if so at what cost? Historically it has showed itself at many times ineffective: first the power to protect culture is not invariably combined with a culture that is worth protecting; a powerful group may maintain itself in command of a people or nation but the culture which it represents may be far from the highest or the best. We have a glaring example of this in present day Germany, while the earlier world is full of such examples. Secondly, groups and classes whose culture is firmly protected from the intrusion of other elements of the community, repeatedly give birth within their own ranks to low grade and anti-social persons. The culture in power is continually tempted to seek by every effort to maintain those persons within the group; to let them prey upon themselves and other groups and to dissipate both power and culture in the endeavor to maintain in the upper class, persons who do not belong there. This is illustrated by efforts in the South to maintain wayward, ignorant and even criminal elements in the upper caste group simply because they are white. Thirdly, and perhaps most important of all these criticisms of cultural isolation, is the fact that in any arrangement of this sort, ability and genius continually flower in the excluded and repressed groups. Often such exceptions to the lower levels of culture are not large in actual number or frequent in occurrence, but they do come and they come often enough to make men question the widsom or possibility of excluding them from the privileged group. And there is always the additional question as to how many more of these apparent exceptions would appear and how often, if they were given chance and encouragement; if they had anywhere near the effort spent upon them that is spent upon the decadent representatives of the higher group. In fact the real basis of the democratic ideal is a naturally unproven, but firm belief that basically men are essentially equal in their ability to assimilate and share in human culture if they have a reasonable chance.

If the doctrine of social flight and cultural class isolation prevails, and usually it does for obvious reasons, it is necessary that social institutions be evolved to maintain it. These social institutions may express themselves in a legal code or caste restriction enforced by police and military power, or the separation may intrence itself almost as strongly in customs with several social penalities for infraction and even violence. This method of separating classes, attempts what is really impossible and is bound to be overthrown sooner or later by cultural pressure from beneath, if not by actual revolution. What becomes of the Mass which Class deserts. It founders; it may retrograde, in which case its social cost is a great hopeless incubus on society, is tremendous; or it may slough off repeated layers in such a way as the laboring classes have continually done; struggling up with limited outlook and poor leadership, until they force more or less recognition from the controlling elements, leaving continually at the bottom, an unrisen and presumably an unliftable residue beneath. Thereupon more liberal social institutions are bound sooner or later to be tried; charity to relieve misfortune and check disease and thus allay discontent and revolt; intergroup ~~and interrace~~ inter-class and inter-

Contact and conferences to explain and clear the air and seek for possible solutions; spreads with one of
Education which may have three quite different objects: it may be aimed to curb ambition and discontent and make the lowly satisfied; or and perhaps combined with the first object, may be the object of making the lowly profitable and useful to upper classes; but third and most far-seeing is the effort to use education in order to discover and encourage ability and with this a more or less clearly conceived plan of draining off this ability into the upper group.

Gradually there may ensue following upon charity, intergroup conferences and education, a policy of group fluidity; efforts to recognize and encourage ability and let it rise as far as possible. The English aristocracy have been wise enough always to recognize ability when it arises, but not yet quite wise enough to discover it and encourage its rise. Always, however, in these cases there are admitted to be certain human hopeless areas; certain classes at the bottom of society which current thought never expects to see developed; and above all in our day, certain races and colors of man who are, with considerable approach to unanimity, put outside of the veil of possibility. For these there is usually adopted a theory of segregation which is not wholly fair in conception or object. If it were fair and logical, it would attempt to allow a separate but autonomous and free development of culture within the prescribed group and every effort would be made to encourage and help this development. Usually, however, there is no thought that such a development is possible, and consequently the interferences and prohibitions are of such nature that there is no reasonable chance for the segregated group to develop. Above all, complete segregation is today practically impossible for economic reasons. There is an intercontinental division of production and distribution of wealth from which no element can be successfully excluded without loss of comfort and safety. There are vast international organizations of men, and in these are included small nations; but these small nations have difficulties in maintaining enough independence for their cultural growth to be really autonomous. They form satellites rather in the orbit of great nations and must respond according to international forces.

How far could American Negroes emulate and establish such a social structure? Barring for the present actual territorial separation, is cultural separation in the same locality possible?

To force a group of various levels of culture, to segregate itself, will certainly retard its advance, since it must put energy not simply into social advance, but in the vast and intricate effort to duplicate, evolve and contrive new social institutions to maintain their advance and guard against retrogression ~~(ghetto Jews)~~. Of this Negroes complain: it is difficult to raise human status in any event; but if effort is complicated by forced duplication of effort, repetition of invention and institutions, it makes the task to the minds of many Negroes, impossible. How can a Negro community separately police itself over the same area which a white community occupies? Can there be two standards of accomplishment, one black and one white in the same culture? ~~and particularly,~~ On the other hand if Class does not desert Mass, can it achieve cultural salvation? ~~Here again comes a problem: shall~~ this must group cultural development adopt without question the expedient of cultural isolation? There can be ~~no~~ two theories here: one that the rise of a talented tenth within the Negro race whether or not it succeeds in escaping to the higher cultural classes of the white race, is a threat to the development of the whole Negro group and hurts their chances for salvation. Or it may be said that the rise of ~~the~~ classes within the Negro group, is precisely a method by which the level of culture in the whole group is going to be raised. But ~~that~~ this depends upon the relations that develop between these ~~c~~ masses and the cultural aims of the higher classes.

41-7-453

Let us examine the general situation in America.

~~There is however another difficulty.~~ So far we have assumed that the upper social class maintains its status mainly by reason of its superior culture. It may however maintain its status because of its wealth and political power and in that case its ranks can be successfully invaded only by the wealthy and those groups able to exercise the ballot. Here however comes another complication. The wealthy may exclude industry and income from the power of the democratic voter. Oligarchy and monarchy may rule in industry, while democracy is confined to the selection of officials whose power is curtailed and to the making of laws covering limited areas of social phenomena and not impinging upon the rights of property, the methods of industry, the distribution of income. In that case, the entrance of the lower classes into the upper strata of society may be arbitrarily limited, and racial and other social prejudice, not to mention mere caprice, may exclude the majority of men from real power.

It is in this direction that ~~without doubt~~

In America we have undoubtedly changed the pattern of social hierarchy. Birth and culture still count but the main avenue to social power and class domination is wealth: income and ~~the~~ oligarchic economic power, the consequent political power and the prestige of those who own and control capital and distribute credit. This makes a less logical social hierarchy and one that can only be penetrated by the will and permission of the ruling oligarchy or the chances of gambling. Education, thirft, hard work and character undoubtedly count, are influenced but ~~become~~ implemented with power only as they gain wealth and they gain wealth by permission of the dominating wealthy class.

If now American Negroes plan a vertical parallel of such a ~~this~~ structure and such processes, they will find it practically impossible. First of all they have not the wealth; secondly, they have not the political power which wealth manipulates, and in the realm of their democratic power they are not only already partly disfranchized by law and custom, but they suffer the general same limitation of democratic power in income and industry, in which the white masses are imprisoned. There remains ~~only~~ the path of education and ability in art and science, partially but not wholly open, and recognition of superiority in these channels guarantees no entrance into the dominating culture classes today in America. Even in England where the path open for the low born cultured and able is wider it is not wide and there is no systematic effort to discover and encourage ability in the masses. When it is discovered and the way is open, the persons thus admitted to the ranks of the cultured are almost always given wealth and the consequent political influence.

41-7-455

There would be greater possiblility of the Negro imitating the class structure of the white race if those whites who advise and encourage it were ready to help in its accomplishment, ready to furnish the Negro the broadest opportunity for cultural development and in addition to this to open the way for them to accumulate such wealth and receive such income as would make the corresponding structure secure. But of course those who most vehemently tell the Negro to develop his own classes and social institutions, have no plan or desire for such help. First of all and often deliberately they curtail the education and cultural advantage of black folk and they do this because they are not convinced of the cultural ability or gift of Negroes and have no hope or wish that the mass of Negroes could be raised even as far as the mass of whites have been. It is this insincere attitude that especially arouses the ire and resentment of the culture groups among American Negroes. [redacted]

When the Negro despairs of ~~paralleling~~ duplicating white development his despair is not always because the paths to this development are shut in his face but back of this lurks very often a lack of faith in essential Negro possibilities, parallel to similar attitudes on the part of the whites. Instead of this proving anything concerning the truth, it is a natural phenomenon. Negroes, particularly the better class Negroes, are brought up like other Americans despite the various separations and segregations. They share, therefore, average American culture and current American prejudices. It is almost impossible for a Negro boy trained in a white northern high school and a large white college, to come out with any high idea of his own people or abiding faith in what they can do; ~~or for a Negro trained in the South~~ He can rationalize his own status as exceptional. He can well believe that there are many other exceptions, but he cannot ordinarily believe that the mass of Negro peoples have possibilities equal to the whites.

41-7-458

~~What the American Negro has got to realize is that American social methods are not to be assumed as perfect~~

Working & segregated the deadening environment of insult and caste even in the best homes & schools good teachers & teaching facilities & their poverty almost universally denies.

It is this sort of thing that leads to self-criticism. My grandfather Alexander Du Bois, was reared as a gentleman and sent to a high-grade private school until his white father's sudden death; and then penniless he was pushed into the Negro group. He resented it. He wasn't a"Negro", he was a man. He would not attend Negro picnics or join a Negro church and yet he had to. He and his fellows were invited out of the Episcopal Church on the Yale campus and he became first senior warden of the present St. Luke's which the Negro congregation formed.

That unhappiness that Chesnutt

Now his situation in 1810 was much different from mine in 1938 because the Negro group today is much more differentiated and has distinct cultural elements. He could go to a Negro picnic today and associate with interesting people of his own level. So much so indeed, that some Negro thinkers are beginning to be afraid that we will become so enamoured of our own internal social contacts, that we will cease to hammer at the doors of the larger group, with all the consequent loss of breadth through lack of the widest cultural contact, and all the danger of ultimate extinction through (exacerbated racial repulsions and) violence. For any building of a segregated Negro culture in America in those areas where it is by law or custom the rule and where neglect to take positive action would mean a slowing down or stoppage or even retrogression of Negro advance, unusual and difficult and to some extent, unprecedent action is called for.

No reconcilable

~~Shall we~~ follow ~~this~~ class structure of America? ~~The answer is clear.~~ We cannot. We do not have the conomic or political power, the ownership of machines and materials, the power to direct the processes of industry, the monopoly of capital and credit. On the other hand if we cannot follow this method of structure nevertheless we must do something. We cannot stand still; we cannot permit ourselves simply to be the victims of exploitation and social exclusion. It is from this paradox that arises the present frustration among American Negroes. In the past the path seemed clearer. For a while it was education. When we had educated leaders all things else would be added unto us. This was not untrue; it was half-true. Then came the faith in political power; but political power is limited by the power of wealth in the United States and even in its limited field we are partially disfranchised. Then came the faith in agitation and the courts, but all this depends upon a responsive and sympathetic public opinion which is disposed to enforce rights and protest justice done to Negroes. Such public opinion is ~~probably~~ growing but it is growing slowly. Its full development will demand several generations. Meantime is there no way out? Yes, there is because that class structure; that system of domination of industry and the state through income is breaking down not simply in America but in Europe. We have no power ~~or could~~ to ~~assist~~ this breakdown, but positive action by ~~group action by~~ the mass of Negroes in their capacity as consumers, ~~or a chance~~ to follow a path which will aid a peaceful economic revolution and extricate the Negro from his present paradox. To realize this let us see what the change is in the relation of the consumer to the economic organization of the world.

The Consumer

In primitive times, all consumers -- save ~~the young~~ infants, the very old and a few others-- were producers; all who ate, who were clothed, sheltered and protected, helped in some way to furnish food, build huts, weave cloth or prepare skins and wield weapons. Later, consumers became gradually divided into those who made or furnished goods in exchange for what they consumed, and those who mainly furnished services., and those who did little or nothing. In Europe during the Middle Ages, the wage system arose, under which some of those who helped produce goods, were paid before the goods were actually sold by the guild masters or employers. But when new masses and kinds of raw materials, raised overseas by black slave labor, appeared; and when these materials, affording not simply the rich furs and precious metals but necessary supplies of common textiles, were processed and transformed by new, costly and ingenious machines in factories, there arose a large class of producers who did not offer goods for their services since they owned no goods; their part in the producing producing process was to give their services to capitalist employers and as a quit-claim to their part-ownership in the goods finally produced, they were regularly furnished consumption goods as wages by their employers. There arose then a class who were not really producers but who from their controll of the process of production, their ownership of machines and raw materials, and their monopoly of the goods being produced, became the most powerful persons in the modern state. From their control of production, they could dictate consumption, determining what goods should be produced, and how they employees they should be distributed among the workers-- not only among the factory workers, but among the farmers and far-off slaves.

The consumer interests, so far as they were represented by the peasants and workers, naturally opposed the power of the owners of capital and naturally wielded some influence: they demanded and successfully fought for political power in a new democratic State; they insisted on certain kinds of food and clothes, and certain standards of life. But ~~in the long run they were pretty thoroughly worsted, their~~ The struggle of labor was different. The main political power, although considerable, was confined to electing officials and legislators, who were strongly influenced by ~~gradually brought under the influence of~~ the owning classes ~~by direct or indirect bribery~~. And More especially, the effective field of democracy was so curtailed by statute law, ancient custom and appointed judges in the courts, that democracy was unable to touch the realm of property and became [illegible] status assured by the growth of capital

8-5-h-7-41

Thus there arose communities of the village type, with peasants and workers who created and consumed by custom and tradition. Then arose the modern state, with the division of workers into classes and conflict between classes.

for a long period after the Industrial Revolution the [illegible] of the workers as consumption goods and the conditions of work were retained. Unrest & rebellion caused their wages and their gradual assuming of [illegible] however brought further increases, but it did not bring democratic control or any conception of the ideals as existing for the well-being of the working workers. This was obscured and often almost completely disguised by the interesting fact that the autocrats of the new industrial process were not [illegible] representatives of the old aristocracy, but new, largely often self-made, men. Their advent to power and to enormous power, seemed to foreshadow a new era, when with freedom of enterprise anyone could rise [illegible] to wealth and rule

This hope was further encouraged by the new products from far parts of the world and by the extraordinary technique which promised an abundance of goods for all the reasonable wants of all men. The hope was frustrated and still is frustrated by the refusal of the autocratic owners of capitol to permit democratic interference with the production and distribution of goods. This refusal had two excuses: First, the ignorance of the masses as to the technique and management of industry, which would make their interference by majority vote disastrous; and, secondly, the assertion that a redistribution of goods and services, on lines of theoretical desert would take away from men the incentives of personal gain, which now induce them to undertake and conduct the present organization of industry with all its risks and of Capitalism and Industry. The present gains depend on such an arranged and manipulated scarcity of goods and services as yield huge profits and power to the owners of capital

Strongly believing in and strongly advocating

The difficulties with these excuses for undertaking x economic reform are two-fold: first, technique and knowledge of the industrial process is not the invention or possession of the owners, but rather of engineers, managers, and skilled workers and scientists, who do not share the huge profits of industry. And secondly, the present arrangement does not work. It has worked for considerable periods in the past; it might still work today, if not perfectly, at least to the satisfaction of most men. But its fatal weakness is that it continually tempts indivual owners and autocratic rulers of innumerable and semi-independent economic, kingdoms, and empires to offer goods at a price which consumers cannot pay, thus seriously up-setting the economic balance, with waste, loss and unemployment. And more fatal than this, combinations of these economic realms and national groups of them, with national and international to work them with, from time to time combine to disrupt civilization by world wide war and murder, with use of all the resources of science, in order further monopolize the goods and services of the world. The men situation is impossible; it cannot go on. Everyone recognizes this danger. Some government interference, some general control and regulation of private industry must take place or civilization collapses.

First of all it is clear that the interests of the consumer and not financial profit must hereafter be the guiding and regulating force in industry. The production of goods and the rendering of services must be planned and directed for satisfying the wants of mankind and not primarily for the enriching of the powerful few. But how can this be accomplished? By violent revolution? perhaps. But the world is war-weary and bitterly disillusioned by the often promised results of mass murder. Revolution only distroys, if that, and afterward the real job of planning and guiding up-building comes.

Why not start with that first? Why not let small groups of consumers all over the world, band themselves together for two objects: direct to break down by their present voting power the legal institutions behind which monopoly of wealth is entrenched today: land monopoly, mal- distribution of tax burdens, unjust allocation of the unearned increment of rents, unfair trade practices with adulteration of foods and misrepresentation of goods, tarif inequalities and bonuses, concealment of income and profits, unhampered and unfair laws of contracts; cheating and gambling, judicial interference with law-making; patent monopoly; news suppression and distortion; and transfer of wealth and power by gift and inheritance, regardless of desert or the public good; above all, the laws and lack of laws which make group action by consumers in the interest of consumers, illegal or ineffective.

The second object of consumers groups should be to themselves to become producers, in competition with the present owners and masters of industry control production by making the interests of themselves becoming producers and thus making the interests of producers & consumers identical. To do this they must begin by creating a primary group of industrial democracy, corresponding to the New England town-meeting in political democracy. Indeed in mediaeval Afriwa just this development was carried out in the village council, where every family was represented, and where economic action was controlled and guided as well as social and political. This was the basic communalism of the African tribe which the slave trade and colonial imperialism killed.

The new modern consumers' group will first essay to understand the real and essential needs of its members, and to supply these needs by goods and services at a reasonable price

Beginning merely as an intelligent distributing unit, it can buy at wholesale without retail profit, risk of unsold stocks, useless advertising and rent. The inevitable attack upon this by modern business methods, can be countered by uniting units for wholesale buying on a wider scale, and finally by cooperatve production and wide planning of services in lines where monpoply permits. It will be a hard fight, and its success depends, on the one hand, on how far integrity, ability and high economic ideals, can be secured to serve these crusading groups, and a new industrial built up to contest the occupation of the individual field with the present individualistic monopolists and free booters. This will call for on the other hand, from the co-operating consumers and all friends of human culture, a parallel and relentless fight against present industrial methods: against the influence of capitalism in politics, against secrecy, privilege and cheating; against the concentrated power of wealth. and for real freedom of the press

The Negro-American Consumer

Right here the American Negro has his opportunity. He is primarily a consumer in the sense that his place and power in the industrial process is low and small. Nevertheless he still has a remnant of his political power and that is growing not only in the North but even in the South. He has in addition to that his economic power as consumer, as one who can buy goods with some discretion as to what goods he buys. It may truly be said that this discretion is not large but it does exist and it may be made the basis of a new instrument of democratic control over industry.

equilibrium

During the days of economic stability when under the capitalist system, wealth was fast accumulating and while far from being equitably distributed, yet was going in much larger proportion than ever before to the white laboring classes, the American Negro as a working class could depend upon increasing wage for himself and white philanthropic attitude and contribution toward his economic and social salvation. Today this is not true. Philanthropy for educational and social uplift is being increasingly curtailed; low wage and unemployment among white workers is widespread; the capitalistic system has been widely modified by government interference and control and in spite of powerful reaction faces without doubt fundamental transformation.

It does not seem impossible to establish gradually such little islands of industrial democracy and socialized wealth, clustered for defense and more complete economic autonomy, even though for a season, they continued to be surrounded by an ocean of monopoly and anarchists of present industry.

t The cultural differentiation among American Negroes has considerably outstripped the economic differences, which would set this group aside as unusual and at the same time open possibilities for institutional development and changes of great importance. Fundamental in such change would be the building up of new economic institutions suited to minority groups without wide economic differences and with distinct cultural possibilities as shown by the increasing number of college graduate among them, the varying but persistent development of a literature of expression and of a Negro-American art.

The fact that the number of Negro college graduates has increased from 215 between 1876 and 1880 to 10,000 between 1931 and 1935 shows that the ability is there if it can act, but in addition to mental ability there is demanded an extraordinary moral strength, the strength to endure discrimination and not become discouraged; to face almost universal disparagement and keep one's soul; and to sacrifice for an ideal which the present generation will hardly see fulfilled, is an unusual demand and no one can say off-hand whether or not the present generation of American Negroes is equal to it. But there is reason to believe, that if the high emotional content of the Negro soul could once be guided into channels that promised success, the end might be accomplished.

Despite a low general level of income these people probably spend at least one hundred and fifty million dollars a month under ordinary circumstances and they live in an era when gradually economic revolution substituting the consumer as the decisive voice in industry rather than the all-powerful producer of the past. Already in the Negro group the consumer interest is dominant. Outside of agriculture the Negro is a producer only so far as he is an employee and usually a subordinate employee of large interests dominated almost entirely by whites. His social institutions, therefore, are almost entirely the institutions of consumers and it is precisely along the development of these institutions that he cannot only move in general accordance with the economic development of his time and of the larger white group but in this way evolve unified organization for his own economic salvation.

The fact is as the Census of 1930 shows, there is almost no need that a modern group has which Negro workers already trained and at work are not able to satisfy.

41-7-46 B

Already Negroes can raise their own food, build their own homes, fashion their own clothes, mend their own shoes, do much of their repair work, raise their own cows and pigs and raise some raw materials like tobacco and cotton.

A simple transfer of Negro workers, with only such additional skills as can easily be learned in a few months, would enable them to weave their own cloth, make their own shoes, slaughter their own meat, prepare furniture for their homes, install electrical appliances, make their own cigars and cigarettes.

Appropriate direction and easy obtainable technique and capital, would enable Negroes further to take over the whole of their retail distribution, to raise, cut, mine and manufacture a considerable proportion of the basic raw material, to man their own manufacturing plants, to process foods, to import necessary raw materials, to invent and build machines and to transport goods by automobile, ship and airplane. Certain patented machines and processes and monopolized natural resources they must buy, but they could buy them on just as advantageous terms as their competitors if they bought in large quantities and paid cash.

Large numbers of other Negroes working as miners, laborers in industry and transportation could without difficulty be transferred to productive industries designed to cater to Negro consumers. The matter of skill in such industries is not as important as in the past with industrial operations massed and standardized. ~~On the other hand,~~ Without doubt there are difficulties in the way. ~~This~~ The Negro population is scattered. The mouths which the Negro farmers might feed might be hundreds or thousands of miles away, and carpenters and mechanics would have to be concentrated and guaranteed a sufficiency of steady employment. All this would call for careful planning and particularly, such an organization of consumers as would eliminate unemployment, risk and profit. ~~The~~ Demand organized and certain must precede the production and transportation of goods. The waste of advertizing ~~would~~ must be eliminated. The difference between actual cost and selling price would disappear, doing away with exploitation of labor, which is the source of profit.

All this would be a realization of democracy in industry led by consumers organizations and extending to planned production. Is there any reason to believe that such democracy among American Negroes could evolve the necessary leadership in technique and the necessary social institutions which would so guide and organize the masses that a new economic foundation could be laid for a group which is today threatened with poverty and social subordination.

Let us see how Negroes could start toward this development. A small group of people could found a consumers cooperative store. This has been done many times, among American Negroes. It is an easy beginning; but it is faced by all sorts of pitfalls. There are in the United States now perhaps a dozen such Negro experiments. Their first temptation is to make this an ordinary store, ~~where they depend upon the chance customer and succeed by more or less concealed profit.~~ They succeed in being simply private businesses run by Negroes which may or may not succeed. For wider success their next step should be on the one hand the selection of trained leaders and on the other hand intensive education of the rank and file. Leaders must be selected and selected with every care. The store manager must be honest and efficient. He must know goods and be able to buy them and exhibit them. ~~More than that and either combined in his personality or that of another~~ He or his directors must have knowledge of economic history and processes, of methods of work and decent wages of ideals, which many ~~must be~~ first of all know Consumers Cooperation: its history, its principles, its failures and vast successes. In addition he must know modern business methods, ~~or~~ ~~must this assistant~~ He and his clerks must should be observed in the store and in the goods which the store keeps. There must be a selection of persons who can teach the clientele. These teachers must point out that a consumers cooperative aims at revolution in economic methods; the standardizing of the demand for goods and eliminating senseless vagaries in fashion and lazy refusing to forecaste a week or a month's needs, ignorant submission to advertising propaganda, so that the store will eventually be able to absolutely count upon selling ninety-nine per cent of its goods for cash to people who know what they want and buy it regularly and promptly. The organized clientele must be told about the purity of the goods, about the tricks of the trade, about the fallacy of cheapness. They must learn to know that nothing is cheap if it is made by sweat shop methods, composed of harmful materials and unsuited for the object for which it is sold. This is the second stage of cooperative effort. In this cooperative community there need be no absolute color line. People of all groups and colors can join, but the direction of it must be in the hands of Negroes if Negroes are to learn. Then comes the next step which is the cooperative wholesale. The single retail store is almost certainly doomed to succumb to the ruthless competition of chain stores, especially when its small supporting clientele is only beginning to learn the ethics and methods of group solidarity. If it can early unite with similar groups until savings can be made in wholesale buying, and until gradually production and manufacturing can come in to make a consumers parallel to the vertical trust, then and not until then can the consumers movement among Negroes achieve a foundation which makes a new economic institution certain and safe. In this process it will be possible to use to some extent consumers' organization already established among the whites. There are wholesales and manufacturing plants, but the Negro cooperative movement can ot rest here. If it does it will find that, quite unconsciously and without planning, Negroes will not be given places of authority or perhaps even of ordinary cooperation in these wider institutions, and the reason will be that the white cooperators will not conceive it probable that Negroes could share and guide this work. This the Negro must prove in his own wholesale and manufacturing establishments. Once he has done this and done it thoroughly there will gradually disappear any discrimination current in the wider cooperative movement. But that will take a long time.

Meantime this integration of the single consumers cooperative into wholesales and factories will intensify the demand for selected leaders and intelligent democratic control over them — for the discovery of ability to manage, of character, display of absolute honesty, of inspirational push not toward power but toward efficiency, of expert knowledge in the technique of production and distribution and of scholarship in the past and present of economic development. Nor is this enough. The eternal tendency of such leadership is, once it is established, to assume its own technocratic right to rule, and begin to despise the mass of people who do not know, who have no idea of difficulties of machinery and processes, who succumb to the blandishments of the glib talker, and are willing to select people not because they are honest and sincere but because they wield the glad hand. Now these people must not be despised, they must be taught. They must be taught in long and lingering conference, in careful marshalling of facts, in the willingness to come to decision slowly and the determination to tyrannize over no minorities. There will be minorities that do not understand. They must be taught to understand. There will be minorites who are stubborn, selfish, self-opinionated. Their real character must be so brought out and exhibited until the overwhelming mass of people who own the cooperative movement and whose votes guide and control it, will be able to see just exactly the principles and persons for whom they are voting.

The group can socialize most of its professional activities. Health can be put upon the same compulsory basis that we have tried in the case of education, with universal service under ~~teachers~~ physicians if possible paid by the state, or helped by the state, or paid entirely by the group. Hospitals can be as common as churches and used to far better advantage. The legal profession can be socialized and instead of being as it is now a defense of property and of the anti-social aggressions of wealth, it can become as it should be the defense of the young ignorant and careless. One of the greatest handicaps of the Negro group today is its crime. The greatest single source of that crime is the mistreatment of ~~the~~ young ~~careless~~ and ~~the~~ offending ignorant in the police court, and the subsequent training in crime which these victims afterward recieve in ~~jails and~~ chain gangs, prisons and penitentiaries. In the cooperative community no accused person should ever come before the court without a trained legal defender. No punishment should be allowed to stand which is not primarily and continuously an effort to make the offender a useful member of the group. Banking should be so arranged as to furnish credit to the honest in emergencies and not simply as a method of gambling, theft, usury exploitation and profit-making. Our insurance business should cease to be, as it so largely is, a matter of deliberate gambling and become ~~simply~~ a cooperative service to equalize the incidence of misfortune equitably among members of the whole group without profit to anybody.

Or & just unneeded savings & useful and socially necessary work. Banking should not be simply and merely

But you will say, how can all this be done? Where is the authority — the social force to carry it out? To prevent sabotage & outside interference?

They could not only furnish pupils for their own schools and colleges but could control their teaching force and policies, their textbooks and ideals. By concentrating their demand, by group buying and by their own plants they could get Negro literature issued by the best publishers without censorship upon expression and they could evolve Negro art for its own sake and for its own beauty and not simply for the entertainment of white folk.

Certain general and professional services they cou change from a private profit to a mutual basis. They could mutualize (in reality + not in name) banking and insurance, law and medicine.

Here the political power of the Negro might be used. So far as law and interpretation of law is concerned there is little more that can be done in the United States through pressure upon legislatures. Legal caste in the South is impregnable until public opinion changes, which will not be noticeable in our day. Even decisions of the high court like the Gaines decision, just and commendable as they are, are of little value so long as public opinion in certain states absolutely refuses to enforce them. There is no conceivable Federal power that can make the University of Mississippi receive a black student. On the other hand, there is need of law to release the chains of property about the feet of consumers. Federal legislation is needed to standardize organizational procedure for cooperatives and make it possible for them to organize under Federal charters. This has been done in the case of credit unions but not in the case of general cooperatives. Many state cooperative laws need to be modernized and court decisions liberalized. Pressure from Negro voters can help to accomplish this. But above all the American Negro must remember that he is primarily a consumer; that as he becomes a producer it must be at the demand of organized consumers and according to their wants; that in this way he can gradually build up the absolutely needed cooperation in occupations. Today we work for others at wages pressed down to the limit of subsistence. Tomorrow we may work for ourselves exchanging services, producing an increasing proportion of the goods which we consume and being rewarded by a living way and work under civilized conditions. This will call for self control. It will eliminate the millionaire and even the rich Negro. It will put the Negro leader upon a salary which will be modest as American salaries go and yet sufficient for a life under modern standards of decency and enjoyment. It will eliminate also the pauper and the industrial derelict.

But it is possible to make insecurity pay as much to educate a black boy as it does a white, which will strengthen our Negro American system

To a degree, but not completely, this is a program of segregation. The consumer growth is an important aspect of a self-segregated growth. We are segregated largely without reason. Let us put reason & power beneath this segregation, & [illegible] economic power will make us absolutely free for intellectual creation in other & wider fields & for eventually tearing down all segregation based on color of skin or curl of hair.

Here comes tremendous opportunity in the Negro housing projects of New York, Chicago, Atlanta & other centers; in re-settlement projects like the Negro farmers' colony near Montezuma, Georgia. Rail if you will against the race segregation here involved & condoned but take advantage of it by planting secure centers of Negro cooperative effort and

There are unpleasant eventualities which we must face. For instance, if the Negro in America is successful in welding a mass or large proportion of his people into groups working for their own betterment and uplift, they will certainly, like the Jews, be suspected of sinister designs and inner plotting, and their very success in cultural advance be held against them and used for further and perhaps fatal segregation. To some Negroes and their friends the very enumeration of these difficulties shows the impossibility of any segregated Negro cultural [illegible]. Other Negroes argue that while [illegible] may be difficult, the necessity of trying it cannot be evaded and that what it calls for is, first the mental ability to carry it through.

There is of course the possibility of the plan of a minority group among the opposed to the best interests of a neighboring or enveloping or larger group, Naturally a group the larger and more powerful group may think certain policies of a minority are inimical to the nati nal interests ~~and this certainly will complicate and perhaps frustrate minority plans.~~ The possibility of this happening must be taken into account. Its threatening imminence must be met by intelligent publicity, appeal and propaganda. In this way the Negro group in the United States can establish for a large proportion of its members a cooperative commonwealth finding its authority in the concensus of the group and its intelligent choice of inner leadership. It can see to it that not only no action of this inner group is opposed to the real interests of the nation but that it works with and in conjuction with the best interests of the nation. It need draw no line of exclusion so long as the outsiders join in the concensus. Within its own group it can in the last analysis expell the anti-social and hand him over to the police force of the nation. On the other hand it can avoid all appearance of conspiracy, of seeking goals incompatible with the general welfare of the nation, it can court publicity, it can exhibit results, it can plead for cooperation. Its great advantage will be that it is no longer as now an attempt to march face forward into walls of prejudice, but rather a mass movement, forward in paths of its own where prejudice if it moves can cooperate and if it does not move cannot, save in extreme cases, hinder.

Have we the brains to do this?

here in the land we have ~~Thus we~~ easily land into a morass of criticism, ~~and lose~~ without faith in the ability of American Negroes to extricate themselves from their present plight. Our former panacea emphasized by Booker T. Washington was flight of class from mass in wealth with the idea of escaping the masses or ruling the masses through power placed in the hands of those with larger income. My own panacea of earlier days was flight of class from masses through the development of a Talented Tenth but the power of this aristocracy of talent was to lie in its knowledge and character and not in its economic power. Both these flights were rationalized by existing differences in education and by the thoughtless and the imitators, by degrees of white blood and widespread laziness. But now the whole economic trend of the world has changed. That Mass and class must unite for the world's salvation is clear. We who have had least class differentiation in wealth can follow in the new trend and indeed lead it.

Negro democracy

The discussion of leadership among American Negroes has not usually be associated with a parallel discussion of democracy. What Negroes have meant by democracy is the right to have their wishes and needs considered in the general social objects of the nation. They have southt to attain this with political power and followed this with a vision of economic power through control of capital. They are now forced to consider the building-up of democracy and democratic power among themselves through consumers organizations. This means two things: ont only democractic control by democratic control not simply by accidental majorities but by general concensus of opinion by such overwhelming agreement within the group that no important minority opinion is suppressed or overwhelmed. Such a result calls for widespread intelligence among the cooperators. Largely this must be intelligence of school training but not entirely. It must include the intelligence of experience and common sense. Beyond that there must be the distinct recognition of leadership, the leadership of ~~character~~ integrity, the leadership of inspiration, the leadership of the ~~expert~~ thinker and the leadership of the scholar. Such leaders are abolutely necessary for the guiding, inventing and conservation of new social institutions. But leadership without followers cannot function. First there is the selection of leaders, a selection which calls for knowledge of human nature, recognition of gift and ability and willingness to be led when once the validity and efficiency of the leadership is recognized. For a people just out of slavery to voluntarily subordinate themselves to leadership and to leadership not of white folk, ~~where~~ written by hereditary training they have been used to looking ~~down~~ up, but from their own fellows, ~~whose~~ despite natural distrust and petty envy they may not ~~await it yet where~~ learn by all hope and faith in themselves it must and can be found.

47-7-47

The battle which I shall not then attack was that of Reconstruction, which by unfortunate fate combined to wealth — a continuous system of race domination

~~But~~ Such leadership ~~is sacred only in its real gift and vision. It~~ has no divine right to ~~obtrude itself on others except~~ rule save as democratic consensus chooses to follow it. Each leader is himself a follower in every direction, except where he excells and where his excellence ~~has been chosen~~ is recognized as a group goal. Moreover, leaders must make no impossible assumptions. Leadership in X does not imply leadership in Y; expert knowledge in chemistry does not ~~imply~~ carry with it scholarship in history. ~~Indeed quite the contrary and~~ So too, leadership is not necessarily a matter of special genius. It may be the result of hard work, of unusual opportunity, of blind chance, of high faith. But the success of democracy depends upon the ability of the masses so to overcome stupidity, jealousy and selfishness, as to put in the seats of authority and maintain there, those who know and are able. The opposite process, by which the able, the expert, the technocrats assume the right to rule as inherent in their knowledge, will in the end be a mistake as great as personal rule by divine right.

leadership may be infinitely varied. Indeed in its last analysis it is conceivable that nearly every human being should be a leader in some direction by special gift, by special knowledge, by special experiences, by individual character. This is that anarchy of the spirit ~~toward~~ for which all great and free souls have ~~aimed~~ aspired.

Legal caste in the South is impregnable until public opinion changes, which will not be noticeable in our day. SCOPE OF PROPOSED ENCYCLOPAEDIA

It is proposed that the Encyclopaedia be devoted mainly to the American Negro, but that it should include important related topics regarding the Negro in Africa and elsewhere. It is believed that an Encyclopaedia of about four volumes of the general type of the "Encyclopaedia of the Social Sciences," each volume containing about 500,000 words, would be suitable. It should include all important phases of Negro Life and History—anthropological, ethnographical, biographical, historical, educational, industrial, economic, political, religious, psychological (including race relations), artistic, etc.

There has been in recent years a remarkable increase of scholarly writing on the subject of the Negro, especially in America, and now there are many conferences, institutes, and associations, which stress cooperative scholarship on themes related to the Negro. Prior to the beginning of this century such scholarly work as had been done on the Negro in America and abroad was almost entirely the result of individual effort and initiative. There were almost no groups giving themselves to Negro research. The initiative in this matter in the United States was taken by Dr. Du Bois through his "Atlanta University Studies of the Negro Problem" which appeared from 1897 to 1911. These stood almost alone for many years. These publications were supplemented by the establishment of the "Department of Records and Research" at Tuskegee Institution in 1908, and the editing under its auspices by Mr. Monroe Work since 1912 of the various editions of the "Negro Year Book." Later years have seen the establishment by Dr. Woodson of the "Association for the Study of Negro Life and History" in 1915, and the publication of its "Journal of Negro History" since 1916. This publication has made available many important documents and has greatly increased the interest in Negro History. In the last decade we have also seen at three Negro Universities — Howard, Fisk and Atlanta — the beginning of graduate study, as well as the development of Faculty and student groups interested in inter-racial studies at many of our leading Universities of early foundation, both North and South, the "Research Institute" at the University of North Carolina being a conspicuous example. Various national associations not primarily devoted to research have also developed important research departments or activities in the field of Negro history or Negro life. Such are the Urban League, the Federal Council of Churches, and the Commission on Race Relations.

Thsse movements and the publication of "Histories" of the Negro, and histories of various phases of Negro Art, Literature, etc., have greatly stimulated individual scholars. As a result probably more scholarly monographs and articles regarding the Negro have appeared from the representative presses of Europe, America and Africa since the World War than in all the previous period. These deal with the African background of the American Negro, the early Slave trade, Negro Anthropology, Negro Slavery in the United States, Economic Status of the Negro, etc. They have brought to the fore the work of a group of scholars, many of them young men, whose published material, although scattered, is now abailable as Monroe Work's "Bibliography of the Negro," 1928, indicates.

The recent establishment in Europe of the "International Institute of African Languages and Cultures" should also prove most helpful, as well as the development of departments for the Study of Native Culture at the Universities of South Africa. Practically all of these movements have developed in the past decade.

It is believed that the body of factual data which such an encyclopaedia would make available as a result of the work of the Editors and various collatorating groups and individuals would be invaluable to scholars and all others who may seek authoritative information regarding any important phase of Negro life or history.

CHARACTER OF ARTICLES

It is proposed that articles should be relatively brief, with full bibliographies, the method of treatment combining high scholarship, judicial fairness and readableness. It is believed that contributors should be chosen from the standpoint of expert knowledge and competence; that all articles should be paid for, probably at the customary rate of two cents a word; and they should be signed by initials, the full names and positions held being duly recorded in a contributors' list. Contributors should aim to give facts authoritatively and objectively with such interpretations as may be necessary, clearly stating divergent views on important controversial matters. It is believed that the main purpose of the Encyclopaedia as a book of reference will be best served if the plan of a large number of relatively brief alphabetically arranged articles is adopted, and if the last volume contains a complete index, as well as an arrangement of major articles by subjects, to facilitate systematic study.

REPLIES TO ENCYCLOPAEDIA LETTER

October 1-October 10, 1935

(White)

"I think the idea of an Encyclopaedia of the Negro is capital and hope that it can be carried out. Of course we need it...

"I hate like sin to write encyclopaedia articles, but am willing to do one for you, if you will give me a topic not too taxing."

(Signed) Charles Beard
Connecticut

"I shall of course be glad to see you about your interesting project."

(Signed) Edwin R. Seligman
Columbia University

14-4-62

"It will be a great pleasure to see you when you are able to come here though I am afraid I have not much knowledge or wisdom respecting the projected encyclopedia."

(Signed) J. F. Jameson
Washington, D. C.

"I thoroughly approve of your plan of an Encyclopaedia of the Negro. I am sorry to say that I could not promise any contributions because my time is so fully taken up, and at my age I ought not to take over anything new. I shall, however, be glad to recommend to you responsible students for special subjects if youso desire."

(Signed) Franz Boas.
Columbia University.

"I may say at once that I am greatly interested in the project and will give any assistance in my power."

(Signed) Robert Morss Lovett
University of Chicago.

"I had heard of the proposed Encyclopaedia of the Negro before and it is my opinion that the time is ripe for such a cooperative enterprise. I am flattered that you wish me to contribute to the encyclopaedia."

(Signed) B. B. Kendrick
The Woman's College of the University of North Carolina

"I do indeed believe that the time has come when some authoritative collection of articles concerning the Negro race in the form of an encyclopaedia is in demand, and I of course want to co-operate in the project in any way that I can."

(Signed) Anson Phelps Stokes
Washington, D.C.

"I shall esteem it an honor and a privilege to contribute to the Encyclopaedia of the Negro."

(Signed) Raymond Pearl
Johns Hopkins University

(White) October 1-10, 1935

"Replying to yours of the 10, I think it would be a valuable thing to have an authoritative encyclopaedia concerning the Negro race; but I am sorry to say that on account of my health I cannot promise any articles or contributions.

"My former assistant for two years, Professor Samuel Warren, now at Prairie View State College, Prairie View, Texas, prepared an excellent topic for me some four or five years ago on the cropper system. He has not yet finished his dissertation but passed amongst the highest in our preliminary written examinations for the Ph.D. degree. I should be much interested if he could be asked for two or three articles along the lines of his studies."

(Signed) John R. Commons.
University of Wisconsin

14-4-63

"In response to your letter of September 10th, I may say that it does seem to me that there is a place for an authoritative collection of articles concerning the Negro race.

"I would be entirely willing to contribute an article or articles if there appeared to be something within my particular range of interests."

(Signed) Leland H. Jenks.
Wellesley College

REPLIES TO ENCYCLOPAEDIA LETTER

October 9-October 15 1935

(White)

"I think your plan is an excellent one and I should be very happy to be identified with it. However, my time is very heavily mortgaged now and I cannot think that I should be able to contribute anything in the way of an article that would be worth your consideration; since I cannot undertake to do anything now, I make no suggestions regarding subjects."

(Signed) Edith Abbott
The University of Chicago.

"I am very much inclined to feel that the time is ripe for an Encyclopedia of the Negro. As the explanation accompanying your letter states, there has been a very great increase of genuinely scholarly literature on the Negro during the past decade and the growth both of more objective and judicial attitude and of a deeper understanding of the problems involved in the Negro problem in this country. I think it quite certain that a work of the proporations you suggest would be warmly received. It would be essential, of course, that your ideals of scholarship and scientific objectivity and candor should be carried out. Such a work could be easily spoiled by too much special pleading, whether favorable or unfavorable, to popular attitudes toward the Negro question.

"I feel honored to be asked to contribute."

(Signed) F. H. Hankins
Northampton, Massachusetts.

"I appreciate very much indeed your letter of September 10 inviting me to contribute to the Encyclopedia of the Negro. I am not in any sense an authority or specialist in the field which I take it will be covered by the Encyclopedia. It has my warmest approval, and I am very much interested in its successful completion.

"If it happens that there are any special topics on which you think I might write, I should be glad to consider them, but I can scareely conceive ofa subject which I could write with authority in this field or one which might not be better handled by someone else."

(Signed) W. J. Shepard
The Ohio State University.

"I received today your letter of September 10 re the Encyclopaedia ofthe Negro. I am certainly very much interested in the realization of this important and very timely project. And, as I am very much interested in racial problems and in the problems of 'backward' or 'colonial' peoples, I shall be glad to contribute some article,--on the general problems of racial conflicts and racial theories or on the political and social problems of 'backward peoples' in the age of modern imperialism."

(Signed) Hans Kohn
Smith College.

"I am delighted to see signs of life in the Encyclopaedia of the Negro. There is really need for such a work. Whether it can come into existence in the immediate future depends merely on how enlightened American opinion turns out to be. There is no doubt of the essential need of the work itself for American scholarship and American life.

"I do not know of any subject in which I can be regarded as expert enough to be considered a useful contributor to the Encyclopaedia. Perhaps in the course of time you may think of a way in which I can be helpful, as I should be very happy to be."

REPLIES TO ENCYCLOPAEDIA LETTER (Continued) 1935.
(White) October 9-15, 1935

(Signed) J. E. Spingarn
Troutbeck, Amenia, New York.

"I. I believe that an Encyclopedia of the Negro will be of real value not only to the serious students of race relations but also to many general readers interested in human affairs.

"2. I shall be glad to co-operate in any possible way."

(Signed) Thomas Jesse Jones
Phelps-Stokes Fund.

14-4-20

"I have your letter of September 23. I am not competent to judge whether there is a real demand at the present moment for a Negro Encyclopaedia. That there should be one some time or other is perfectly obvious. I shall, of course, be glad to contribute articles that come within my field and knowledge. If biographical sketches should be included, I should be ready to do one on Wendell Phillips, Garrison, John Brown, etc."

(Signed) Oswald Garrison Villard
New York, NewoYork.

"Responding to yours of September 10th just received, I will say that I think it would be a very fine thing to publish an Encyclopaedia of the Negro. It would bring to many his achievements, show his friends what was being done in many lines and, furthermore, bring to bear the findings of the anthropologists concerning the Negro race and Negro culture.

"I should be very glad, were I able, to contribute as you invite me to do, but my heart has been over-taxed and won't allow me to be as active as I was, so I have to content myself with restricted activity. I am still Chairman of the Department and carry my full teaching load, but I just have to sidestep other undertakings, so I shall have to ask you to excuse me, much as I am interested and willing."

(Signed) E. A. Ross
University of Wisconsin.

"I will be very glad to cooperate in your Encyclopaedia of the Negro project if too much work is not involved."

(Signed) Niles Carpenter
The University of Buffalo.

"In response to your letter of September 10, may I say that I think it is an appropriate time to go forward with the work on the Encyclopaedia of the Negro. I assume that one of the factors involved is, of course, finance. It seems to me that it will be easier to secure funds for enterprises of this sort during the coming year than it has been at any time during the past three or four years. However, I base my opinion on timeliness on quite another factor, namely the mounting interest in the Negro as an American citizen.

"I should also like to give my assistance to your suggestion that I become one of the contributors of the Encyclopaedia." (Signed) E. C. Lindeman
The New York School of Social Work.

Oct. 9-15 1935

(White)

"I know something of the project for the Encyclopaedia of the Negro since, I believe, I am one of the representatives of the National Research Committee on your advisory board. As such I shall, of course, be glad to cooperate with you.

"I think the attention of the Encyclopaedia as far as Africa is concerned should be centered on West Africa particularly, and I should be glad to do such articles as fall within my competence concerning the cultures of that region."

(Signed) Melville J. Herskovits
Northwestern University.

"I have your letter of September 10th. There can hardly be, I believe, a difference of opinion as to the desirability of having an Encyclopaedia of the Negro conceived and executed according to the best standards of scientific scholarship. Unfortunately, I cannot undertake to make any contribution to such an Encyclopaedia, partly because of my lack of special knowledge in the field that would be canvassed, and partly because I have undertaken work that will require all my writing and research energies for a good many years ahead."

(Signed) Felix Frankfurter
Harvard University.

"It does seem to me that an authoritative work of this kind is much needed, and I believe it would find a substantial demand for it.

"If you think I know enough to write for you I shall be very glad to do it, and I am happy to be asked."

(Signed) Carl Van Doren
New York, New York.

"At the present time, I am heading the Labor Relations Section of the Works Progress Administration, and of course am extremely busy. However, your enclosed prospectus described the field of contribution as very broad, and in the event you might wish to include some phase of unemployment relief as it affects the Negro, possibly I could furnish you some information."

(Signed) Nels Anderson
Washington, D. C.

"I am of course gratified that you should think of me as a possible contributor to the proposed Encyclopedia of the Negro. It will be a pleasure and an honor to contribute if there are topics which fall within the fields in which I have any right to claim competence."

(Signed) E. S. Latourette
Yale University.

"I have your letter of September 10, and certainly agree that there is a place for a good Encyclopaedia of the Negro. Further, I would be willing to contribute to the extent that I am able to do so."

(Signed) Frederick G. Detweiler
Denison University.

(White)

"I am inclined to think that your project is a useful one and I would be glad to be associated with it."

(Signed) Louis I. Dublin
Metropolitan Life Insurance Company.

"I think an encyclopaedia of the Negro is badly needed, and that the time for doing it is as soon as possible. Unluckily, I'd hesitate to offer to contribute to it. I am, of course, interested in the subject, but I know of no detail of it in which the information of other men is not greater than my own. I suggest that if possible it ought to be done principally by Negroes--indeed, it would be best if it could be done wholely.

(Signed) H. L. Mencken
Baltimore, Maryland.

14-4-22

"In reply to your letter of September 10, I am in entire agreement with you that the time has come for the publication of an encyclopaedia of the Negro such as you describe. Whether or not this is the right time to launch an appeal for funds, I do not know.

"Not only am I delighted and honored to be on your Board of Directors but I shall be glad to help the project in every possible way. I could, of course, write certain articles myself, and hope to be invited to do so, but possibly my best service would be in some kind of semi-supervisory work where African matters are concerned."

(Signed) Charles T. Loram
Yale University.

"I am enthusiastically in favor of the project as you have outlined it. At the moment I can think of no greater gap in our knowledge of American life and culture to be filled than that which such a work would meet. Personally I would find it invaluable.

"If requested, I should be glad to contribute."

(Signed) Carleton Beals
New York, New York.

"I have your letter of September tenth asking my opinion on the plans for publishing an Encyclopaedia of the Negro. I certainly agree with the Board of Directors that the publishing of such work is advisable and needed at this time. Schools throughout the country simply do not have factual material about the cultural contributions of the Negro.

"I have not had much time to give thought on the kind of an article I could supply but perhaps with your knowledge of my work you would be in a better position to determine that. My work with teachers is in the field of techniques involved in changing attitudes but probably you would need something which shows more closely the relationship between our schools and the problem of cultural pluralism in America."

Service Bureau for Education in Human Relations.

"I quite agree as to the timeliness of an authoritative collection of articles concerning the Negro race in the form of an encyclopaedia. Also I should be glad to contribute an article or articles on some subject to be decided upon later, as you suggest."

(Signed) Roscoe Pound
Harvard University.

"The project for the 'Encyclopaedia of the Negro' sounds most interesting. Certainly a vast body of material that would be included init has not been adequately covered in other works of reference and an increasing number of people throughout the world are realizing the extent of men's ignorance about most things concerned with the history and development of one large segment of mankind.

"I should be most happy to contribute articles on any subject where I happen to have special knowledge."

(Signed) John V. Vandercook
New York, New York.

"I am very much interested in your letter, dated September tenth but reaching me only a week ago, in which you describe a proposed encyclopaedia of the Negro. It seems to me that such an encyclopaedia would be highly useful and that this would be an opportune time to set about preparing it. I should consider it an honor to contribute an article or two, if any subject could be fonnd within the range of my competence."

"Your letter of September 10, reached me here at Fisk University. I am very much interested in the Encyclopedia of the Negro, and shall be glad to make any contribution to that enterprise that I can...

"I suppose you will eventually work out a list of topics and as soon as that is done, I shall be very glad to see it. I can promise you my support in anything that I can do to carry this enterprise to completion."

(Signed) Robert E. Park

"I am interested in your letter received during my absence from the city, concerning the proposed Encyclopaedia of the Negro. I have submitted it to our Librarian who writes:

> 'At first I was rather inclined to think this proposed publication rather unnecessary, but on second thought I believe it might prove really useful. The Negro Year Book and the Bibliography of the Negro are about the only reference books at present on the subject. No one has ever asked about such an Encyclopaedia so far as I can remember. If not too expensive it might be of great interest, particularly to libraries.'"

(Signed) Joanna C. Colcord
Director
Charity Organization Department of the Russell Sage Foundation.

"It seems to me that an Encyclopaedia of the Negro people would be very worth while undertaking and that it would serve a very useful purpose. It must be done in a calm and scholarly way that will command the respect of the critically competent.

"I will be glad to contribute if in the opinion of the editorial board there are any subjects to be treated that fall in the field of my competence."

(Signed) E. B. Reuter
State University if Iowa.

"I of course would warmly approve the project of an encyclopedia of the Negro and earnestly hope it may have attention in the proper quarters. But as I am unknown in Washington I suspect that my recommendation would have little weight. If you think it would and can designate the proper person to address, I will gladly write a letter."

October 21-October 23

"I think your plan of producing an Encyclopaedia of the Negro is good and deserves every encouragement. I am sure the time has come for such a comprehensive survey and I have no doubt that it will meet with a considerable interest from many sides. It is natural that the Encyclopaedia should deal mainly with the American Negro, but at the same time you ought to have anumber of authoritative articles on Negro life in Africa.

"I am quite willing to co-operate in this undertaking and in a tentative way I propose that I could write an article on:

1. Education in Africa, or
2. Christianity and the African Negro, or
3. African languages and the Value of their Study.

"I think you will also want to have one article on the activities of the International Institute of African Languages and Cultures and I should of course write this article with particular pleasure.

"When your plan will be in a more advanced stage, I should like to publish a note on it in our Journal Africa and I hope you will then be willing to write such a note. It might have the length of one printed page of the journal. I know our readers will be interested in this matter."

"I want to thank you for your recent letter with reference to the plans for an Encyclopedia of the Negro.

"The project sounds most interesting and I appreciate your invitation to contribute to the volume. I am afraid, however, that my editorial duties will leave little time for the preparation of any manuscripts aside from my regular editorial contributions to Today."

(Signed) Raymond Moley

"I am in full agreement with you and the Committee as to the desirability of bringing out an Encyclopaedia of the Negro, and I shall be delighted to help in any way possible."

Replies to Encyclopaedia Letter (Continued) 1935
October 21-November 2

(White)

"My interest in the Encyclopaedia is perhaps indicated by the fact that a year ago last April I accepted an appointment to the Advisory Board as a representative of the American Council of Learned Societies. Since that time, I have heard not a word about the project. I am sure that there is a demand at the present time for an encyclopaedia of the Negro properly and scientifically done. I would be glad to co-operate with contributions on such subjects as might be agreed upon. My one question concerning the project has to do with the possibility of its scientific character being strictly maintained in spite of the pressure for eulogistic and reform emphasis which will certainly be brought to bear. The fact that you have been nominated as one of the two editors-in-chief gives me confidence that this pressure will be effectively resisted."

(Signed) Donald Young
Social Science Research Council
New York, N.Y.

"I emphatically believe that the time is ripe for a Negro encyclopedia and am happy to know that its production is under consideration again.

"Naturally I should be delighted to contribute to it if your board of editors should find a subject which it believes I can develop satisfactorily. Even so I am sorry you are asking white writers to contribute. The Negro is quite capable of telling his own story and when his encyclopedia is written I think it ought to be written by him. I think it would be highly creditable to the Negro to do this job himself.

"At all events I should be pleased to have you advise me of any important developments of the tentative plans."

"I am greatly interested in your letter of November 1 concerning the proposed Encyclopaedia of the Negro. I had heard this proposal discussed somewhat by your associates. It seems to me very much worth doing and I hope that your directors will now find it possible to proceed. The time should be propitious for the preparation of an exceedingly important historical document."

"I wrote you from Washington about my interest in the Encyclopaedia. I now find your letter raising the question about specific suggestions that should be included and asking whether I would be willing to contribute. I am so heartily in favor of this that I can assure you that I will do anything which the committee thinks I can do to help. A little later I will try to suggest certain subjects which, in my opinion, should be included in the Encyclopedia.

"I trust that your work on the Encyclopedia may prove to be as stimulating and fruitful as those early studies when you were on the faculty of Atlanta University before."

"I wish to thank you for your letter. I am much interested in your proposal. I have referred your letter to the Director of the Press, Professor Guy Johnson, and Dr. Odum for their consideration and advice.

"I received sometime ago your letter outlining the plans for the publication of this Encyclopaedia of the Negro. I was very much interested in the information your letter contained and have given some little thought to the matter. I have not had an earlier opportunity to write you.

"I am inclined to feel that a publication of this sort would be of very genuine and lasting value. Problems affecting the Negro and the relations between the races in this country are of course numerous and important but many of these problems receive relatively scant treatment and attention in the larger and more comprehensive encyclopaedias and other compendiums of information. I have a feeling that an encyclopaedia worked out along the lines you describe would be welcomed by all serious students of this country who have any interest in social problems, and would make possible a great deal of information which is not now available. I very much hope the project will go forward and that funds can be secured for financing it.

"With respect to my own relationship to any such venture, I feel like saying this: My commitments for the next period of five years or more are fairly heavy. At the same time I should be very willing to express my interest in a project of this sort by contributing an article."

(WHITE)
November 22-December 4 — 1935

"I must apologise for my delay in replying to your letter of 10 September about the proposed Encyclopaedia of the Negro. I t seems to me that such a work would be very desirable from the point of view of science. It is now, as you know, very difficult to obtain detailed and accurate information about the Negro; and when one comes upon statements dealing with racial matters, it is often difficult to trace them to their sources and to learn on what evidence they are based. I believe therefore that all who are interested in having a scientific and impartial treatment of the subject would welcome an encyclopaedia that is at the same time comprehensive and accurate.

"As my own specialties lie in biology and in the history of science, I should be interested in seeing competent articles on the anatomy, physiology, and genetics of the Negro; and also on the intellectual elements in Negro culture. I should be glad to treat a subject within my field; although I can not absolutely promise at present to do so, because of the press of other duties."

"First, I am quite inclined to agree with you that 'the time has come when some authoritative collection of articles concerning the Negro race in the form of an Encyclopaedia is in demand.' REPLIES

(White) January 16, 1936

"There is no doubt of the need for an authoritative collection of articles concerning the Negro race. It is highly desirable that the project you describe be carried to completion if this can be done in a satisfactory manner.

"My feeling is that scholarship in this field is still in its infancy and that a great deal of original investigation needs to be done before any really authoritative encyclopaedia will be possible. I think, for instance, of the anthropology of the southern Negro, in fact, of the whole question of African origins, African influences, of tribal inheritances and survivals. If the plans for the Encyclopaedia can be laid in such a manner that research will be possible in fields that have been neglected, it is clear that the Encyclopaedia will serve not only as a source of information in this field but also as a stimulus to investigation."

"It is certainly in accordance with my opinion that an Encyclopaedia of the Negro is well worth the venture. I am glad to indorse such a move, and would be glad to offer my full cooperation in making it a success. As I have had no previous information concerning the probable plan of such a work, I am hardly in position to say that I would be able to contribute an article if it should be requested of me. However, whatever the plan may be, I am sure I can cooperate with the contributors in getting data on subjects in my field, the Biological Sciences."

Sehr Geehrter Herr Du Bois!

"Haben Sie Dank für Ihr Schreiben vom 9.Februar, dem ich naturlich alles nur mögliche Interesse entgegenbringe. Ich habe meinen Vertreter in nordamerikanischen Angelegenheiten, Ihren Landsmann Mr. Fox, beauftragt, die Angelegenheit im Auge zu behalten. Soweit ich es ubersehe, wird Mr. Fox in den ersten Tagen des April zur Vorbereitung unserer Ausstellung im Museum of Modern Art in New York sein. Ich selbst werde voraussichtlich zur Eroffnung der Ausstellung am 28.April ebenfalls dort eintreffen. Moglicherweise ergibt sich eine Gelegenheit, die Sache dort zu behandeln.

Es hat mir sehr leid getan, dab Sie mich im vorigen Jahr nicht antreffen konnten.

"It would seem that now would be a favorable time to prepare such an encyclopaedia, as I expect that the demand forit will be growing from now on. By the time it is prepared, if the preparation is attended with due notices to the public, there should be a ready market.

"I shall be glad to cooperate in any way in which you think I can be helpful."

"I have read the scope of the proposed Encyclopaedia, and in my humble opinion it is not only highly desirable that this should be done but in the light of the amount of misinformation which is daily, almost hourly, disseminated about the Negro, it must be done. I am certain there is a widespread and insistent demand for such a publication as is contemplated by you and your associates.

"I would be willing to contribute a short article on some subject to be decided upon later."

(Signed) Elmer A. Carter.

"Naturally I am very much interested in the plans for publishing an encyclopaedia of the Negro. I have read with great interest your printed enclosure on the 'Scope of Proposed Encyclopaedia'. "I am awfully glad to know that the plans for publishing an Encyclopaedia of the Negro have been revived. I was deeply interested in this undertaking several years ago when I first heard about the project. So much scholarly work has been done on the Negro by people of all races, particularly in the last two decades; such great progress has been made by the Negro in regard to his own history that it seems unfortunate that there is not some encyclopaedia under one cover that will take in all of this most important and far-reaching work of a rapidly advancing race.

(Signed) Benjamin Brawley.

"I do hope that the project will be revived because I believe you are the one man among us capable of doing a first-class job on it. I say this because I know of no other person in whom we find combined the elements of scholarship, experience and of prestige in such measure as is true in your case. "About a year ago I prepared and read a paper before the Annual Meeting of the Virginia Interracial Commission on 'The Extent and Quality of the Negro Press.' I would suggest that Mr. P. B. It seems that there can be no question of the crying need for some such work and the demand for it, once it is published. If the subsidy is available, I think that the project should be undertaken as soon aspossible.

REPLIES TO ENCYCLOPEDIA LETTER

(Colored)
October 25--November 8, 1935

"In regard to your questions, I would say that under such management as is announced, I do think that a very valuable contribution will be made in the production of such a publication. I am entirely at your disposal in so far as my abilities go for any articles which may be suggested but at the moment I seem to have difficulty in suggesting myself any subjects in which I am interested which might be described as 'concerning the Negro race'. It is entirely possible that as the proposed encyclopedia is developed, we may think of some such subject upon which I can write authoritatively and acceptably."

REPLIES TO ENCYCLOPAEDIA LETTER
(Colored)
October 25-November 8, 1935

"Relative to your inquiry about whether I think such an encyclopaedia is timely, and if I am disposed to write an article for it, may I say that I think there is a demand for such an authoritative work on the Negro covering the subject rather exhaustively as indicated in the memorandum.

"On the matter of my doing an article for the encyclopaedia, I might add that I will be pleased to undertake such a task providing it willnot be required within six months or a year, since I am now in the midstpf an effort to write an agreement with the Pullman Company for the porters and maids, which is a matter of extensive and intricate details."

(Signed) A. Philip Randolph

(Colored)
October 25-November 6, 1935

"In answer to your query as to whether or not such a volume is timely, may I state that there is a considerable need for some authentic and comprehensive source on the Negro in American life. Whether this need would be filled by the publishing of such an Encyclopaedia would, of course, depend upon the nature of the Encyclopaedia, but, in general, I should say there is a need for such a volume.

"In answer to your second query as to whether or not I would consider an article on some subject to be decided upon later, may I state that I shall be very glad to do so and the general field in which I should prefer to make such a contribution would naturally be in the field of education. I shall be glad to make this more explicit later, if necessary."

"With reference to your letter concerning the publication of an Encyclopaedia of the Negro, I am inclined to believe that such a publication is very desirable. I am certain that you and the editorial staff have given attention to the matter of duplication--that is in terms of similar publications, e.g., The Negro Year Book. If this factor of preventing duplication can be controlled to an appreciable extent I see no reason preventing the success of the Encyclopaedia."

"It might be feasible for me to undertake articles along two lines. The first concerning the Catholic Church and the Negro in the United States. The second, the Negro in the United States from a genetical standpoint. There is a third line in which I have been interested; the opportunities before the Negro in the field of science. These headings are tentative and might be changed to suit any particular scheme which the editors have in mind."

REPLIES TO ENCYCLOPAEDIA LETTER

November 25-November 29, 1935

"First. It is my opinion that there is urgent need for a Negro encyclopaedia of high tone: that is, a work presenting a fairly comprehensive range of subjects treated by contributors who are really unbiased authorities in their several fields.

"Second. If I am asked to contribute articles on subjects that I am prepared to discuss, I see no reason why I should not be one of the contributors. On the other hand, I may be able to help by suggesting contributors for some of the fields."

(Signed) Otelia Cromwell.
Miner Teachers College

"I have your very interesting communication of recent date regarding the proposed "Encyclopedia of the Negro"; and replying thereto will say first, that I feel that such a publication would be of inestimable value at this time when so much interest is being manifest in facts about Negroes, not only on the part of Negro students, but also on the part of members of other races.

"As a past president of the Des Moines Branch of the N. A. A. C. P. and a past chairman of the Des Moines Interracial Commission, I am called upon almost every week to bring some information upon the subject before church, school and university clubs and am often embarrassed when asked where one might find a brief summary of such matter as I have given them."

"I have your letter of November 15th, relative to the coming publication of an 'Encyclopaedia of the Negro'. I certainly agree that it is high time that an encyclopaedia such as you mention should be written.

I am willing to contribute any articles on the subjects for which I am qualified. If my services will be required in this matter, I would appreciate being informed sufficiently long enough ahead for the reason that for the past several years I have been taking work in the Graduate School of Medicine at the University of Chicago, and this, together with my recent election as President-Elect of the National Medical Association, will require a great deal of my time."

"I am pleased to acknowledge receipt of your letter concerning an Encyclopaedia of the Negro. In my opinion such a publication will be of the same value to the Negro as a similar work is to the Jewish race, obviously a defense against ignorance, indifference and misrepresentation. As outlined it will be a contribution to human knowledge.

"I found your letter of November 11, which had miscarried because of old address, awaiting me upon my return from an eight days' stay out of the city. I am tremendously interested in the Encyclopaedia of the Negro, and although admittedly I am not much of a judge, I would suppose that the prospects of better times justify the renewal of your effort.

"I shall be glad to contribute a short article as indicated in your letter. My field of special interest is that of test intelligence as it relates particularly to the Negro--White comparisons in the United States. My marginal interests extend into race comparisons from the point of view of psychology in general."

"I am deeply gratified to learn that plans are being revived for the purpose of issuing the contemplated encyclopedia on the Negro. I heartily agree with you that the time is ripe for the consummation of this undertaking and pledge to you and your associates my service and support in the effort.

"I note from the leaflet describing the proposed undertaking that the articles will be confined primarily to the American Negro, but that it is thought advisable to preface these with a section treating of the history and civilization of the Negro and Negroid peoples in Africa. It is here that I may perhaps be able to render such little service. It is my impression that there should be a series of brief articles summarizing the major results of modern archaeological, anthropolgical and historical research in Africa and particularly as those relate to the achievements of the Negro. Specifically, I think there might be a statement on (1) Africa as the birthplace of the human race; (2) Africa as the cradle land of civilization; (3) The black race as empire builders in antiquity; (4) The black race as empire builders in the Middle Ages; (5) Causes of the decline and fall of Negro civilizations in Africa."

"I recall the suggestion made about three years ago concerning the Encyclopaedia of the Negro. I thought at that time the project was a most commendable one and I am still of that opinion. I do think the time has come for something of this sort and if I can make a contribution on a short article or articles on some subject, I shall be very happy to do so. I do not know what my qualifications are for such a service, but shall be glad to fit in any way possible. I have worked in a very intimate way with local committees on Race Relations and we have developed a program in Denver that has in many ways been effective. If you go forward on the plans, I shall be glad to have a suggestion from you and an assignment which I shall attempt to cover."

"I feel sure that the encyclopedia to which you refer would be most enlightening and of value, that is, I mean it might have a sales value to be able to finance itself.

"I am not certain whether I have anything that would fit into your proposed encyclopaedia, as experimental work does not fit in very well until something definite has been found out, either good or bad. If you think of an article that might fit in, I would be very glad to have you let me know, and it may be that I could comply with your request. My not being able to write, and not being good at dictating is another problem."

REPLIES TO ENCYCLOPAEDIA LETTERS

December 17-December 30, 1935

(Colored)

"I read with a great deal of interest your letter concerning the Encyclopaedia of the Negro. I will gladly do what I can to make the venture a success."

(Signed) A. A. Kildare
Lincoln University
Jefferson City, Missouri.

"I am very much interested in the proposed encyclopaedia of the Negro. It appears to me that the idea is an excellent one. Certainly there is sufficient information concerning the activities and life of the Negro to warrant such a work. The demand for such a publication by individuals, as well as organizations, should certainly more than repay the expense and efforts necessary for such a production."

(Signed) N. C. Calloway
Head, Department of Chemistry

"I am in receipt of your letter of December 6, 1935 in which you made mention of a plan for publishing an Encyclopaedia of the Negro. I believe the time is ripe for such a project and I am in accord with it."

(Signed) R. A. Poindexter
Howard University
Washington, D. C.

"I wish to thank you kindly for your letter of December 4th in which you asked me to contribute a short article to be published in the proposed Encyclopaedia of the Negro. While I feel that there is a need for such a compilation I regret to say that I do not believe that I am competent to make such a contribution."

(Signed) M. J. Bent
Meharry Medical College
Nashville, Tennessee.

"On my return from the N. C. C. Conference held at Atlanta last week, I found your letter on my desk, and in reply I wish to say that I heartily agree with you that the time is ripe for the project mentioned in your letter.

"I shall be glad to contribute something in the form of an article on the subject of the 'Negro in Agriculture'. I hope this is what you had in mind, and that it will meet your approval."

The Agricultural and Technical College
Greensboro, North Carolina.

"Yes, I think that a great Negro Encyclopaedia would be of epochal significance and I should be glad to have the privilege of doing an article and if I were to choose a subject it would be preferably Negro Poetry."

(Signed) Claude McKay

"Replying to yours of December sixth it is my opinion that the time is come when an encyclopaedia in the interest of the Negro Race should be created."

(Signed) John A. Kenney

"I agree with you that the time is ripe for an authoritative collection of articles concerning the Negro race. I certainly am willing to participate in this venture."

(Signed) E. A. Gallis
Howard University
Washington, D. C.

"It is pleasing to me to know of the plan to publish such an Encyclopaedia. I believe it would be most helpful as a reference work. I recall an experience of mine while attending the University of Wisconsin in 1928. As a member of a committee assigned to compile certain data on the Negro I found the principal references available were those of Dr. Du Bois, Dr. Work and Dr. Woodson. We could not obtain certain data which was very desirable at the time. I certainly agree that the time has come for the compilation of such authoritative data on the Negro and will be glad to contribute an article or articles to this work. I am unable to give at this time the title of articles which I might contribute however, my contribution would be in agricultural economics or rural sociology."

(Signed) J. M. Coruthers
Agricultural, Mechanical and Normal College
Pine Bluff, Arkansas.

"It is desired to advise that I heartily concur with you and the Board of Directors that we are quite in need of an Encyclopaedia concerning the Negro, and you may rest assured that it will be a pleasure for me to assist you in any way possible to make such an Encyclopaedia a success!

(Signed) C. C. Branche
Veterans' Administration
Tuskegee, Alabama.

"I believe that an able encyclopadia about the Negro would promote better relationships between the Negro and other groups. I am willing to do what I can to make the work a success."

REPLIES TO ENCYCLOPAEDIA LETTERS
December 17-December 30, 1935
(Colored)

"To focus attention intelligently in the direction of certain noteworthy contributions of Negroes I think that the time has come when some authoritative collection of articles concerning the Negro in the form of an Encyclopaedia is necessary. I am quite certain that all too often the racial identity of Negro authors reporting notable contributions made in their respective fields is lost in the daily press and the professional journals. An Encyclopaedia of the type which I think the Board contemplates should serve many purposes.

"If invited to submit an article for publication in the Encyclopaedia I would contribute a survey of the achievements of Negroes in the pure sciences."

(Signed) R. P. Perry
Prairie View State Normal and Industrial College
Prairie View, Texas

"I am heartily in accord with the proposed plans for the collection of a group of articles suitable for publication in an encyclopaedia relating to the Negro race. I also would be pleased to lend whatever assistance that it may be possible for me to give."

(Signed) James A. Parsons, Jr.
The Duriron Company, Inc.
Dayton, Ohio.

"Replying to the contents of both letters I beg to say I am in full sympathy with the plans outlined in the enclosed abstract respecting the publishing of an Encyclopaedia of the Negro. Should you decide to go forward with the work I shall be happy to co-operate in any manner that I may be able to do and in consonance with the plan of the Committee."

(Signed) James A. Cobb
Washington, D. C.

"This is to acknowledge with thanks your communication of November 15th setting forth the proposed project of an encyclopaedia of the Negro.

"I wish to indicate my interest in the proposition, and my willingness to cooperate to the best of my ability in its realization."

(Signed) A. H. Maloney
Howard University
Washington, D. C.

"I regret my delay in answering your letter of November fifteenth. The work that you and your Board are undertaking is of real interest and I shall be glad to make whatever contribution you may advise in your projected publication.

"I certainly agree that an encyclopaedia collection devoted to the Negro race would meet with acceptance and would serve to clarify many facts relative to the Negro which are now, either through ignorance or lack of authoritative information, misinterpreted or incompletely known."

"In the first place let me say that I am deeply interested in the proposed Encyclopedia of the Negro. I think it is very appropriate and, it may be, timely. The financial situation, of course, would largely determine its timeliness. And probably one guess about recovery is as good as another. At least no one can speak with authority concerning it."

"Inacknowledging receipt of your letter of December 11th with enclosed memorandum concerning the contemplated publication of an 'Encyclopaedia of the Negro' I wish to state that in my judgment such a publication would be very timely and would fill a need long felt by scholars as well as the intelligent elements of the general public."

Those who are in frequent contact with the public, especially those who are speaking to the public, so often find it difficult to get definite information very handily without a good deal of difficulty and to have this information compiled in a definite way will certainly be a tremendous advantage not only to these particular persons but will prove of great value to any persons desiring authoritative information about the Negro."

I. ORIGIN OF PROJECT

The plan to publish an Encyclopedia giving authoritative information on all important subjects connected with the history and present status of the Negro was initiated at the meeting of the Phelps-Stokes Fund, April 27, 1931, when a vote was passed setting aside the necessary funds for

> "the purpose of holding a conference of white and colored scholars and leaders of public opinion in the fall of 1931, to consider the possibility and advisability of publishing, with the possible financial help of the Phelps-Stokes Fund and of other Foundations, groups and individuals who may be interested, an Encyclopedia of the Negro, the amount appropriated, or as much thereof as may be necessary, to be used to meet traveling, entertainment and other incidental expenses; with the understanding that if after due consideration the conference is favorably impressed by the project it will be invited to draft a preliminary plan, covering the auspices under which the Encyclopedia should be published, as well as its headquarters, organization of Advisory and Editorial staffs, scope, method of treatment, probable cost, and all other essential factors, which plan may be considered by the Phelps-Stokes Trustees at their November meeting."

The President of the Phelps-Stokes Fund had various conversations with representative educators and officers of Foundations during the Spring and early summer of 1931, and found on all sides great interest in the project. Conferences were also held with the Editors or Publishers of the "Negro Year Book" and "Bibliography of the Negro", the "Dictionary of American Biography", the "Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences", the "Encyclopedia of Education", and the "Catholic" and "Jewish Encyclopedias", memoranda as to costs, method of organization, etc., being secured.

II. CONFERENCE ON PROJECT (NOVEMBER 7, 1931) AND ITS DECISIONS.

A conference of white and Negro scholars and of educational leaders especially interested in the advancement of the Negro was held at the invitation of the Phelps-Stokes Fund and through the courtesy of the University at Howard University on November 7, 1931. Those present were the following:

Mr. William A. Aery, Director of School of Education, Hampton Institute, Hampton, Virginia.
Professor Benjamin Brawley, Howard University, Washington, D.C.
Mr. Jackson Davis, Southern Representative of the General Education Board, Richmond, Virginia.
Dr. James H. Dillard, Ex-President of the Jeanes and Slater Funds, Charlottesville, Virginia.
Dr. George E. Haynes, Federal Council of Churches, New York City.
President John Hope, Atlanta University, Atlanta, Georgia.
President Arthur Howe, Hampton Institute, Hampton, Virginia.
President Mordecai W. Johnson, Howard University, Washington, D.C.
Professor James Weldon Johnson, Fisk University, Nashville, Tennessee.
Professor Charles S. Johnson, Fisk University, Nashville, Tennessee.
Mr. Eugene Kinckle Jones, Executive Secretary of National Urban League, New York City.
President Thomas Elsa Jones, Fisk University, Nashville, Tennessee.
Dr. Thomas Jesse Jones, Phelps-Stokes Fund, New York City.
Mr. Robert M. Lester, representing Dr. Frederick P. Keppel, Carnegie Corporation, New York City.
Professor Charles T. Loram, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut; formerly of South Africa.
Professor Kelly Miller, Howard University, Washington, D.C.
Mr. Walter F. White, Executive Secretary of National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, New York City.
Professor T. J. Woofter, Jr., University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, North Carolina.
Mr. Monroe Work, Director of Research and Records, Tuskegee Institute, Tuskegee, Alabama.

Dr. Anson Phelps Stokes acted as Chairman of the Conference and Professor Benjamin Brawley of Howard University was chosen as Secretary.

All who were invited by Dr. Stokes, acting with the cooperation of President Johnson, attended, except Dr. W. W. Alexander and Mr. Embree, who were both kept away by a meeting of the Rosenwald Foundation the same day; President Keppel of the Carnegie Corporation, who had previous appointments but was represented by his assistant, Mr. Lester; and Principal Moton of Tuskegee and Miss Van Kleeck of the Russell Sage Foundation, who both accepted but at the last moment were detained by pressing appointments elsewhere. The Conference, which it is believed was exceptionally representative of groups and institutions interested in the Negro, was in session for some six hours, and took under consideration a series of questions which had been submitted to its members in advance. The most important tentative decisions reached -- all unanimous -- may be summarized as follows:

That an encyclopedia with some such title as "Encyclopedia of the Negro" covering all important topics in Negro life and history would meet a great need; that it should, if possible, be published; that it should be devoted mainly to the American Negro but should include important related topics regarding the Negro in Africa and elsewhere; that its articles should be of a scholarly, impartial and readable character; that the Editorial Board should include both white and Negro members; that an Executive Committee should be appointed by the Chairman over which he should preside, to consider the auspices under which the Encyclopedia should be prepared and to formulate more definite plans; that a second conference should be held on Saturday, January 9, 1932, to hear the report of this Committee, and to make such further recommendations as may seem advisable; and that Dr. W. E. B. DuBois of New York, Professor Alain Locke of Howard University, and Dr. Carter G. Woodson, Editor of the "Journal of Negro History", should be added to the list of those invited to attend the Conference.

III. APPOINTMENT AND MEETING OF EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

Acting on the instructions of the Conference to appoint an Executive Committee, of which he should be chairman, to formulate more definite plans for the proposed Encyclopedia, the chairman appointed the following from among those present at the Conference:

Benjamin Brawley, Professor of English, Howard University;

James H. Dillard, Ex-President of the Jeanes and Slater Funds;

John Hope, President of the Association for the Study of Negro Life and History, and President of Atlanta University;

James Weldon Johnson, Vice-President of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and Professor of Creative Literature at Fisk University;

Mordecai W. Johnson, President of Howard University;

Thomas Jesse Jones, Educational Director of the Phelps-Stokes Fund;

Charles T. Loram, Sterling Professor of Education in Yale University and formerly member of the Native Affairs Commission of the Union of South Africa;

Thomas J. Woofter, Jr., Professor of Sociology in the University of North Carolina and member of its Research Institute;

Monroe N. Work, Editor of the "Negro Year Book" and of the "Bibliography of the Negro," and Director of the Department of Records and Research at Tuskegee Institute.

All the members of this committee met at Howard University on December 12, 1931, for both morning and afternoon sessions in conference with Dr. Waldo G. Leland, permanent secretary of the Council of Learned Societies, and Dr. Robert T. Crane, permanent secretary of the Social Science Research Council. At this meeting a mutually satisfactory tentative plan of organization was worked out and a Drafting Committee, consisting of Messrs. Brawley, Mordecai Johnson and Stokes, was appointed to prepare a "Preliminary Memorandum on the Encyclopedia of the Negro Project," covering the decisions tentatively reached as to the form of organization, the names suggested for the Board of Directors, the creation of an Advisory Board and an Editorial Staff, and such other kindred matters as might seem to the committee important. It was understood that this memorandum would be submitted to all members of the Executive Committee and that when their comments and criticisms had been received it would be subject to editorial revision by the Drafting Committee and presented as the report of the Executive Committee to the second Conference. This memorandum is the result.

IV. SCOPE OF PROPOSED ENCYCLOPEDIA.

It is proposed that the Encyclopedia should be devoted mainly to the American Negro but that it should include important related topics regarding the Negro in Africa and elsewhere. It is believed that an Encyclopedia of about four volumes of the general type of the "Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences," each volume containing about 500,000 words, would be suitable. It should include all important phases of Negro Life and History -- anthropological, ethnographical, biographical, historical, educational, industrial, economic, political, religious, psychological (including race relations), artistic, etc. etc.

The question of whether or not biographies of living men should be included is difficult to decide. The difficulties of such inclusion are fully recognized, but in view of the fact that the progress of the Negro especially in America, has been so largely influenced by people still living, it seems necessary that the outstanding names -- and only these -- should be included. To deal with the Negro and omit the lives of such white and colored leaders in his development as Dr. DuBois, Dr. Moton and Dr. Dillard, would be difficult. There should be no attempt to prepare a "Who's Who in Colored America," but biographies of outstanding figures in contemporary Negro development would be included, although with great reserve both as to number and treatment.

As to whether or not the Encyclopedia should be illustrated, the arguments seem so evenly balanced that the question is left for later determination. It would, of course, involve considerable extra expense, perhaps $10,000 if illustrations were included, but they would add to the attractiveness of the volumes. A few maps and graphs would seem advisable in any case.

V. NEED OF ENCYCLOPEDIA

It is believed that such an Encyclopedia as is proposed would fill a great need in providing authoritative information for scholars, teachers, editors, students, and the public generally. Attention is called to the entirely inadequate treatment of the Negro in all existing encyclopedias and other works of general reference, and the frequent calls received by librarians and agencies interested for authoritative information on various phases of Negro life and history, which cannot be made available except by much searching.

VI. TIMELINESS OF ENCYCLOPEDIA

It is pointed out that the present is a specially opportune time at which to prepare such an Encyclopedia as the 1930 U.S. Census figures, which will give the most complete statistical information on record regarding the Negro American are now being made available.

Furthermore, there has been in recent years a remarkable increase of scholarly writing on the subject of the Negro especially in America, and now there are many conferences, institutes, and associations which stress co-operative scholarship on themes related to the Negro. Prior to the beginning of this century such scholarly work as had been done on the Negro in America and abroad was almost entirely the result of individual effort and initiative. There were almost no groups giving themselves to Negro research. The initiative in this matter in the United States was taken by Dr. DuBois through his "Atlanta University Studies of the Negro Problem" which appeared from 1897 to 1911. These stood almost alone for many years. These publications were supplemented by the establishment of the "Department of Records and Research" at Tuskegee Institute in 1908, and the editing under its auspices by Mr. Monroe Work since 1912 of the various editions of the "Negro Year Book." Later years have seen the establishment by Dr. Woodson of the "Association for the Study of Negro Life and History," in 1915, and the publication of its "Journal of Negro History" since 1916. This publication has made available many important documents and has greatly increased the interest in Negro History. In the last decade we have also seen at three Negro Universities -- Howard, Fisk and Atlanta -- the beginning of graduate study, as well as the development of Faculty and student groups interested in interracial studies at many of our leading Universities of early foundation, both North and South, the "Research Institute" at the University of North Carolina being a conspicuous example. Various national associations not primarily devoted to research have also developed important research departments or activities in the field of Negro history or Negro life. Such are the Urban League, the Federal Council of Churches, and the Commission on Race Relations.

These movements and the publication of "Histories" of the Negro, and histories of various phases of Negro Art, Literature, etc., have greatly stimulated individual scholars. As a result probably more scholarly monographs and articles regarding the Negro have appeared from the representative presses of Europe, America, and Africa since the World War than in all the previous period. These deal with the African background of the American Negro, the early Slave trade, Negro Anthropology, Negro Slavery in the United States,

47-11-73

Economic Status of the Negro, etc. They have brought to the fore the work of a group of scholars, many of them young men, whose published material, although scattered, is now available as Monroe Work's "Bibliography of the Negro," 1928, indicates.

The recent establishment in Europe of the "International Institute of African Languages and Cultures" should also prove most helpful, as well as the development of departments for the Study of Native Culture at the Universities of South Africa. Practically all of these movements have developed in the past decade.

It is believed that the body of factual data which such an encyclopedia would make available as a result of the work of the Editors and various collaborating groups and individuals would be invaluable to scholars and all others who may seek authoritative information regarding any important phase of Negro life or history. If the necessary financial guarantees can be secured, the work of outlining the contents of the Encyclopedia in definite form and of beginning to secure material could probably be begun in the summer of 1932, or if this is not possible, in 1933. This would permit the completion of the four volumes proposed in 1936 or 1937.

VII. CHARACTER OF ARTICLES

It is proposed that articles should be relatively brief, with full bibliographies, the method of treatment combining high scholarship, judicial fairness and readableness. It is believed that contributors should be chosen from the standpoint of expert knowledge and competence; that all articles should be paid for, probably at the customary rate of two cents a word; and that they should be signed by initials, the full names and positions held being duly recorded in a contributors' list. Contributors should aim to give facts authoritatively and objectively with such interpretations as may be necessary, clearly stating divergent views on important controversial matters. It is believed that the main purpose of the Encyclopedia as a book of reference will be best served if the plan of a large number of relatively brief alphabetically arranged articles is adopted, and if the last volume contains a complete index, as well as an arrangement of major articles by subjects, to facilitate systematic study.

VIII. ORGANIZATION OF ENCYCLOPEDIA PROJECT

It is proposed that the organization for carrying on the Encyclopedia project be made up of three groups, as follows:

A. Board of Directors (Incorporators).

It is proposed that an "Encyclopedia of the Negro Corporation" be (*) incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia, the Board of Directors not to exceed 19 in number, who will serve as a Board of Directors. The () Board of Directors shall consist of the following members:

Dr. W. W. Alexander, President of the Commission on Interracial Cooperation, and President of Dillard University.
 Professor Franz Boas, Professor of Anthropology, Emeritus, Columbia University.
Professor Benjamin Brawley, Professor of English, Howard University, Washington, D.C.
Dr. Otelia Cromwell, Professor of English, Miner Teacher's College, Washington, D.C.
Dr. James H. Dillard, Ex-President of the Jeanes and Slater Funds.
Dr. W. E. B. DuBois, Director of Publications and Research, of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.
 Dr. Leo Favrot, Field Representative of the General Education Board, and member of the President's Commission to Haiti.
President John Hope, Atlanta University, Atlanta, Georgia.

---

* The Board was incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia, May 10, 1932 (see Appendix I)

 This Board was elected by the Conference January 9, 1932, on nominations made by a committee authorized for this purpose consisting of Messrs. DuBois, M. Johnson and Stokes.

 The following were elected and accepted for the vacancies caused by the inability of Messrs. Boas, Favrot and Jameson to serve:

Professor A. R. Radcliffe Brown, Department of Anthropology, University of Chicago (formerly Professor of Social Anthropology, University of Cape Town).

 Dr. J. Franklin Jameson, Chief of the Division of Manuscripts, Library of Congress.
Professor Charles S. Johnson, Professor of Sociology, Fisk University Professor James Weldon Johnson, Professor of Creative Literature, Fisk University, Nashville, Tennessee.
President Mordecai Johnson, Howard University, Washington, D.C.
Dr. C. T. Loram, Sterling Professor of Education, Yale University, New Haven, Conn.
Dr. Robert Russa Moton, Principal of Tuskegee Institute, Tuskegee, Alabama, and Vice-President of the National Urban League
President Florence Read, Spelman College, Atlanta University
Dr. Anson Phelps Stokes, President, Phelps-Stokes Fund.
Mr. Monroe N. Work, Director of Research and Records, Tuskegee Institute.

and two additional Directors to be co-opted by the Board of Directors from members of the Conference not included in the above, and from such other names as they may consider advisable.

This Board of Directors shall have final responsibility and power in all matters in connection with advancing the Encyclopedia project, electing the editors, approving the editorial policy, and publishing the volumes. It shall select the publishing house to publish the Encyclopedia and make all arrangements as to format, cost, royalties, etc.

The Board of Directors shall have the power to fill any vacacies due to resignation, death, or other cause, in its own number, with the understanding that the two groups, white and colored, shall always be approximately equally represented in their membership. It shall also have the power of delegating to an Executive Committee, similarly composed, such duties as it may think desirable.

The Board shall elect a Chairman, Secretary, Treasurer and such other officers and committees as it may think desirable. A Trust Company may be chosen as Treasurer.

If any member of the Board of Directors shall be elected to the Editorial Staff his place on the former shall forthwith be vacated.

The Board shall aim to secure the necessary financial support for the undertaking from Foundations, groups and individuals that might be specially interested. It shall make all appointments, except members of the Advisory Board, shall fix all salaries, approve all budgets, and in all other ways arrange for the effective carrying out of the Encyclopedia project.

Members of the Board of Directors, as well as of the Advisory Board, shall serve without compensation, but their traveling and incidental expenses in connection with attendance at meetings shall be met by the Treasurer.

* B. Advisory Board.

It is proposed that an Advisory Board be constituted through the election of two members by each of the following organizations:

American Council of Learned Societies
 The Social Science Research Council
The American Council on Education

National Research Council

International Institute of African Languages and Culture

South African Association for the Advancement of Science
(one White and one Native)

Howard University
Fisk University
Atlanta University

Hampton Institute
Tuskegee Institute

The Commission on Interracial Cooperation

 The Association of Negro Life and History

---

* For names of members who have accepted their elections see Appendix II

 The two associations indicated are the only ones which have not accepted membership in the Advisory Board.

also such additional individuals, not to exceed six in number, as the Board of Directors may name.

This would mean an Advisory Committee of 32 if all the organizations join, as is hoped for, and if all co-opted vacancies are filled. The first three named have already through their officers agreed in principle to the proposal.

The duties of this Advisory Board would be as follows:

1. To give individually, collectively and through the organizations and institutions represented active cooperation and support in carrying through the Encyclopedia project.

2. To make recommendations on any matters regarding the Encyclopedia to the Board of Directors, which matters shall be considered privileged business.

3. To consider and report on any specific matters referred to it by the Board of Directors.

4. To advise with the Board of Directors on the appointment of the Editorial Staff. Editors (including Associate Editors) must meet with the approval of the Advisory Board.

5. To advise regarding the appointment of Consultants, the duties of Consultants being to make recommendations to the Editors (including Associate Editors) regarding available scholars for writing on various topics in their respective fields.

It is understood that no members of the Board of Directors shall serve on the Advisory Board, or the Editorial Staff.

The Advisory Board shall have no administrative functions.

417-11-78

C. The Editorial Staff.

The Editorial Staff shall be chosen by the Board of Directors. In case of the Editors* such choice shall be made only with the consent of the Advisory Board. The staff shall include two Editors and two Assistant Editors - all of whom shall give full time service.

The Editorial Staff shall work under the leadership of the Editor or Editors, who will be responsible to the Board of Directors, their approval being necessary in the case of the appointment of Assistant Editors and other Assistants. The Editors, after conference with the Assistant Editors, shall decide, subject to the approval of the Board of Directors, on the general organization and distribution of material for the Encyclopedia. It is expected that the Assistant Editors will be called upon to write a considerable number of articles for the Encyclopedia and to aid in the work of revision. In case of any unexpected serious difference of opinion between the Editors appeal may be taken to the Board of Directors, whose decision will be final.

67-11-27

IV. CONTRIBUTORS

The Conference on the Encyclopedia of the Negro has wisely expressed the opinion that the most competent writer should be chosen for each article,

---

* The term "Editors" is used in this memorandum to include both Editors and Associate Editors, if such are decided upon.

At the close of the second Conference a majority recommended to the Directors that the Editorial Board should, if possible, be "under the leadership of a Negro" with white and Negro scholars as his associates.

irrespective of his race, but it seems only fair that where there are two candidates of equal merit in scholarship, fairness and literary capacity, of whom one is white, the other Negro, the Negro should in general be given the preference. Assignments shall be made by the Editors after conference with the Assistant Editors and after taking into consideration the recommendation of Consultants.

X. HEADQUARTERS

It is proposed that the headquarters of the Encyclopedia shall be in Washington, D.C., as near as possible to the Congressional Library. The reasons which have led to the choice of Washington are:

1. That it is the National Capital;

2. That it has in the Congressional Library the greatest collection of books and manuscripts available for reference purposes in America, with its facilities freely open to both groups;

3. That the Libraries and records of the U.S. Bureau of Education and of other Government Bureaus and Departments are available;

4. That the cost of living and of administering the work in Washington will be considerably less than in New York, the only other place seriously considered for the headquarters;

5. That there is in Washington connected with Howard University a group of research scholars whose services will be available.

Elaborate offices would be neither necessary nor desirable. They should, however, be adequate and in a fireproof building. It would be necessary to make sure in advance that the management would welcome a staff including members of the Negro group.

47-11-80

XI. TENTATIVE EXPENSE BUDGET

It is tentatively proposed that the budget be made up approximately as follows:

Two Editors, Salary	$16,000.00
*Two assistant editors, each $5,000	10,000.00
*Two research Consultants and Revisers, each $3,000	6,000.00
Two secretaries, each $1,250	2,500.00
Additional clerical assistance	500.00
Total salaries (per year)	$35,000.00
For a four year period the salary expense would be, therefore,	$140,000.00
Office Rent, $1,500 a year, 4 years	6,000.00
Payment of articles at 2 cents a word, 4 volumes of 500,000 words each	40,000.00
Office equipment, including furniture, fireproof files, reference books, etc.	1,500.00
Miscellaneous office expenses, stationery telephone, postage, etc. $1,500 a year - 4 years	6,000.00
Travel Expenses - Editors, Directors' Meetings, etc. $1,000 a year	4,000.00
Funds for special researches and reports	2,500.00
Fund for contingencies	25,000.00
Total estimated expense of preparing material for publication	$ 225,000.00

* Possibly during the first year this number might not be necessary and more might be needed later.

It is proposed that the Board of Directors aim to secure from Foundations, groups and individuals interested a fund of $200,000.00, all expenses of preparing and publishing the material in excess of this figure being paid from receipts on sales of the Encyclopedia.

Preliminary but careful estimates from the Yale University Press show that in the general form of the "Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences," without illustrations, and providing 10 per cent for alteration of proofs, the cost for 3,000 sets would be $7,362 per volume, or for 4 volumes $29,448. This is merely a tentative estimate from a single experienced publishing house to which the project is in no way committed.

It is believedthat the four volumes would sell for at least $25.00 a set, or for 3,000 sets: $75,000.00

To offset these receipts there would be the following estimated debits:

For Commissions and sale expenses	$5,000.00
For cost of printing	30,000.00
For paying the extra cost of collecting and editing material above the $200,000.00 grants	25,000.00
Total payments to be deducted		60,000.00
Net total estimated receipts if 3,000 copies are sold		$15,000.00

It would require the sale of nearly 2,000 copies before all accounts were balanced. Provision might be made that receipts, if any, over and above expenses could be used by the Board of Directors for establishing such a fund or funds in the interest of the Study of the Negro, as might commend itself to its judgment. It is hoped and believed that ultimately 5,000 copies could be sold.

Attention is called for comparative purposes to the fact that the costs of somewhat similar Encyclopedias have been as follows:

Monroe, Cyclopedia of Education, 5 vols. 1915	$35,000	each	$175,000
Catholic Encyclopedia, 1917, 16 vols.	40,000	"	640,000
Dictionary of National Biography, now in progress, 20 vols.	30,000	"	600,000
Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences, now in progress 15 vols.	70,000	"
Total estimated cost over			1,000,000
Encyclopedia of the Negro, 4 vols.	56,000	"	225,000

The overhead for a small encyclopedia is necessarily greater per volume than for a more extensive work. It is believed that by strict economy the "Encyclopedia of the Negro" project could be carried through for the amount estimated, it being understood that about two years would be given mainly to preliminary preparation and collection of material, and two years mainly to the printing and publishing of the material, with the four volumes probably appearing simultaneously.

No formal approach has yet been made to any Foundation or individual for support except that the Phelps-Stokes Fund at its meeting in November, 1931, provided a small sum to meet the expense of committee conferences, and agreed, from its very limited resources, to set aside a sum of at least $5,000 "with the understanding that the Encyclopedia shall be edited on the most impartial and scholarly lines", and "in case a satisfactory plan can be worked out and adequate financial assistance can be secured from other Foundations and individuals." The Fund hopes that its active interest may lead to other Foundations, groups and individuals putting in much larger sums, as has been frequently the case in the past, although no assurances have as yet been secured.

XII. ATTITUDE OF NATIONAL LEARNED AND SCIENTIFIC SOCIETIES

The Chairman has had most satisfactory interviews with the Officers of the Council of Learned Societies, The Social Research Council, the American Council on Education, the National Research Council -- the four recognized National Societies covering all fields of learning and scholarship. The results of these interviews may be briefly summarized as follows:

(a) Council of Learned Societies. In a long letter from Mr. Leland, Permanent Secretary of the Council, under date of November 28th, 1931, occur the following paragraphs:

> "In our conversation the other day, we discussed the various ways of approaching the problem. It was my opinion that the subject matter of the Encyclopedia is such as to interest the four national councils that deal with practically all fields of science, learnings, and education, namely, the National Research Council, the Social Science Research Council, the American Council on Education, and the American Council of Learned Societies. You brought up the importance of having Negro interests represented, to which I replied that while they are represented so far as their subject matter is concerned in the councils enumerated, it might be practicable to have them more specifically represented, possibly through the agency of the two leading colored universities, Howard and Fisk.
> "I believe that the four councils would be willing to name representatives to a planning conference, which might meet several times for the purpose of considering all aspects of the undertaking, and especially for drawing up the plan for its execution and of settling upon the personnel to whom the execution should be entrusted. Thus the principal function of this planning conference or committee would be to get the enterprise actually started.
>
> "In the execution of the enterprise it would be necessary to have an editor, an associate editor, an adequate staff, and an advisory board. The Encyclopedia could conceivably be undertaken under the joint auspices of the four councils that I have mentioned. I rather doubt if any one of the councils would care to assume exclusive responsibility."

In a supplementary letter under date of December 7th, replying to a request from the Chairman for additional information, Mr. Leland stated that he saw no objection to the proposed bi-racial character of the Editorial Staff, and added that "if we should endorse the project and take part in planning it and setting it up, we ought to take some part, if necessary, in its support. However, I feel quite sure that the major part of the support would have to be secured from other sources, such as Foundations interested, individuals, etc." This was in keeping with the original plan.

(b) Social Science Research Council. In a letter under date of December 4th, 1931, summing up the interview held with him by the undersigned and Dr. W. W. Alexander, Director of the Commission on Interracial Cooperation and Chairman of the Social Research Council's Committee on Interracial Fellowships, and Dr. Thomas Jesse Jones, Educational Director of the Phelps-Stokes Fund, Dr. Crane, Permanent Secretary of the Council, stated among other things the following:

> "The Social Science Research Council would regard the Encyclopedia as some distance from the centre of its interest - too far, probably, for this Council itself to undertake to raise the funds for this enterprise in preference to others.
> "This Council is, on the other hand, keenly interested in The Negro in America - his future is the most important problem in the future of our national life. A failure to have your project go forward would be a cause of great regret to our Council. I am able, therefore, to assure you that our Council is ready to go fairly far in backing your effort; in giving the sort of endorsement that we find acceptable to donors of funds, and even in sponsoring the undertaking, if either or both of these are desired by you. Our Council would be satisfied to see the undertaking placed wholly under the auspices of the National Research Council, or of the American Council of Learned Societies, or of the Social Science Research Council. The editorial board would be selected after consultation with you and with all of these councils, regardless of which council took the responsibility. I am of the wholly personal opinion that sponsorship by any one of these councils is preferable from a practical standpoint to any joint sponsorship; but, if you should be convinced that the latter is to be desired, and that the S S R C should be included, I shall be glad to take the question up with our members."

47-11-95

(c) American Council on Education. An interview was held by the undersigned with Dr. Mann and Dr. MacCracken, representing the American Council on Education, December 8th, 1931, at which interview they showed a deep interest in the project, and said that they would present it sympathetically to the attention of the Executive Committee of the Council at its meeting December 12th. At this meeting a memorandum prepared by Dr. Stokes was presented.

The following letter from Dr. Mann, the Director of the American Council on Education, under date of December 15, 1931, shows the hearty interest which the Council takes in our project:

> "Your letter of December 9 with the accompanying memorandum on the Encyclopedia of the Negro was presented to the Executive Committee of the American Council on Education at its meeting December 12.
> "The Committee voted to endorse the project and cooperate to the extent of appointing one or two representatives of the Council to attend the next meeting of your Conference on this subject. If you will let me know when the meeting will be held we will see that the Council is properly represented."

47-11-86

(d) National Research Council. Owing to Dr. Vernon Kellogg's illness and absence in the west, it has not been possible to see him. As, however, his resignation was accepted December 8th, and Dr. Merriam, Director of the Carnegie Institution, who is a member of the Executive Committee of the Council, was then appointed its Acting President, the undersigned sought an interview with the latter and found that although it was outside the major field of the Council's work he personally believed that if the Encyclopedia project was carried through, the National Research Council should have some relationship to it. He saw no reason why the Council should not name two representatives to try to work out a satisfactory plan and advance the project. He laid great emphasis on the importance of integrating the various approaches to the study of the Negro. Attention was called to the fact that the National Research Council has been actively interested in anthropological, ethnological, and psychological studies, and in race migrations, all of which have their direct bearing on aspects that would have to be covered by such an Encyclopedia.

XIII. CONCLUSION

The conferees are unanimously of the opinion that the above program is a wise and feasible one, believing that it provides all essential gurantees such as high scholarship, fairness in the treatment of the Negro and his problems, interracial cooperation in the conduct of the enterprise, and an effective organization which will carry weight with donors and assure the project being carried through -- if the financial support can be secured -- in a dignified and competent manner. The Conference pledges to the Board of Directors as elected its support in carrying out the plan for the proposed Encyclopedia substantially along the lines outlined.

Brief Biography of Dr. DuBois

William Edward Burghardt DuBois was born at Great Barrington, Mass., February 23, 1868. He received the degree of Bachelor of Arts at Fisk University in 1888, the same degree at Harvard in 1890, that of Master of Arts at Harvard in 1891, and, after a period of study at the University of Berlin, that of Doctor of Philosophy at Harvard in 1895, his thesis being The Suppression of the African Slave-Trade to the United States of America. Dr. DuBois taught for a short while at Wilberforce University, and was also for some time an assistant instructor in Sociology at the University of Pennsylvania, producing in 1899 his study, The Philadelphia Negro; but in 1896 he accepted the professorship of History and Economics at Atlanta University, where he remained thirteen years. He was the moving spirit of the Atlanta Conference, and by the Studies of Negro Problems which he edited annually in this connection became recognized as one of the outstanding sociologists of the day. Meanwhile he was contributing to the Atlantic Monthly, the World's Work, and other leading magazines, and in 1903 brought together a number of his papers in the notable book, The Souls of Black Folk. In 1910 Dr. DuBois left Atlanta to go to New York as Director of Publicity and Research for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. There he founded and edited for many years "The Crisis" magazine. Two years ago, however, he returned to Atlanta, to the reorganized Atlanta University to devote his major time to historical research; and in 1935 he published one of his most important works, Black Reconstruction, which was immediately recognized by scholars as revising the conventional attitude toward the period with which it dealt. Among his other books are John Brown (1909), a contribution to the series of "American Crisis Biographies"; two novels, The Quest of the Silver Fleece (1911) and

47-11-93

Dark Princess (1928); and Darkwater (1920), another collection of essays. In 1919, at the close of the World War, he organized the Pan-African Congress, which met in Paris. Later congresses met at his call in London and Brussells, 1921, in London and Lisbon, 1923, and in New York;1925.

Benjamin Brawley - Professor of English, Howard University; author of "A Short History of the American Negro", "Early Negro American Writers", and other works.

Charles T. Loram - Chairman & Director of Graduate Studies, Department of Race Relations, Yale University (formerly Native Affairs Commission, Union of South Africa.

Report of Progress

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF THE NEGRO

March 20, 1936

1. Several conferences attended by representative white and colored scholars and educational leaders were held at Howard University in the winter of 1931-32 at which all phases of the project were discussed and unanimous agreement reached as to the need of an encyclopedia, its scope, character of articles, etc., as outlined in the Memorandum.

2. The ENCYCLOPEDIA OF THE NEGRO was incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia May 10, 1932, the incorporators being Professor Benjamin Brawley of Howard University; Dr. James H. Dillard, former President of the Jeanes and Slater Fund; Professor W. E. B. DuBois of Atlanta University; Professor Charles S. Johnson of Fisk University; Dr. Mordecai W. Johnson, President of Howard University; Dr. Waldo G. Leland, Secretary of the American Council of Learned Societies; and Dr. Anson Phelps Stokes, President of the Phelps-Stokes Fund.

3. A Board of Trustees was secured, broadly representative of the best American scholarship of both groups and including scholars from the leading universities. Similarly, an Advisory Board was set up representing Learned Societies at home and abroad, and organizations specially interested in Negro progress. All the persons named have accepted.

4. The project has been presented in a preliminary way to several of the Foundations, but after conferences, which in one or two cases have given some encouragement, it seemed best to postpone seeking major financial support until the project was further advanced and the depression more a thing of the past.

5. The Phelps-Stokes Fund has by small grants made it possible for the Executive Committee to meet from time to time, and to provide a small fund for

47-11-95

Dr. DuBois, "In Charge of Preliminary Correspondence", to do some foundation work.

6. The work accomplished by Dr. DuBois and his assistants includes:

(1) Securing the endorsement of the project and the assurances of support from the leading men of both groups whose names are given in the enclosed circular.

(2) Securing important data as to the leading collections both in public and private hands, on Negro Americana and Africana, in this country and abroad.

(3) Securing from Dr. Johnson, the Associate Editor of the Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences, and others, expert advice as to various matters in connection with the organization of an Encyclopedia staff and of the material for Encyclopedia articles.

(4) Opening of a temporary office for the Encyclopedia at Atlanta University, with the understanding that this will be moved later to Washington.

(5) Outlining of the major subjects to be discussed in the Encyclopedia and their principal sub-divisions.

(6) Securing of the names of the leading scholars, white and colored, American, European, and African, who could be called upon for articles on the more important subjects.

7. The decision by the Board of Directors that, subject to the approval of the Advisory Board, Dr. DuBois is -- especially now that he has retired from the Editorship of the Crisis and similar activities, to devote his major time again to historical scholarship -- the best qualified man for the Editorship. The names of several scholars of the white group are under consideration as Associate Editor, in accordance with the provisions of the Memorandum.

47-11-96

8. The assurance by the Phelps-Stokes Fund that funds will be available to continue Dr. DuBois' present work for another year by which time it is hoped that some of the larger Foundations may be prevailed upon to make the whole project possible.
